HARPER'S WEEKLY FOR 1865.—VOLUME IX.

The Ninth Annual Volume of HARPER'S WEEKLY is completed with the present Number. The foregoing General Index and Index to Illustrations will suggest to the reader the extent and value of its Literary and Pictorial contents.

The year now closing is the most eventful in American History. The Battles about Richmond, General Sherman's March through the Carolinas, the Siege of Mobile, the Surrender of the Rebel Armies, followed speedily by the capture of Davis and the collapse of the Confederacy, the tragic death of Lincoln, and the operation of President Johnson's Reconstruction Policy, have each in their turn been topics of the most intense interest. The numerous and accurate Illustrations of these events which have been given in this Volume impart to it unusual interest and a permanent value.

This Volume contains 130 Portraits of Eminent Writers, Soldiers, and Statesmen.

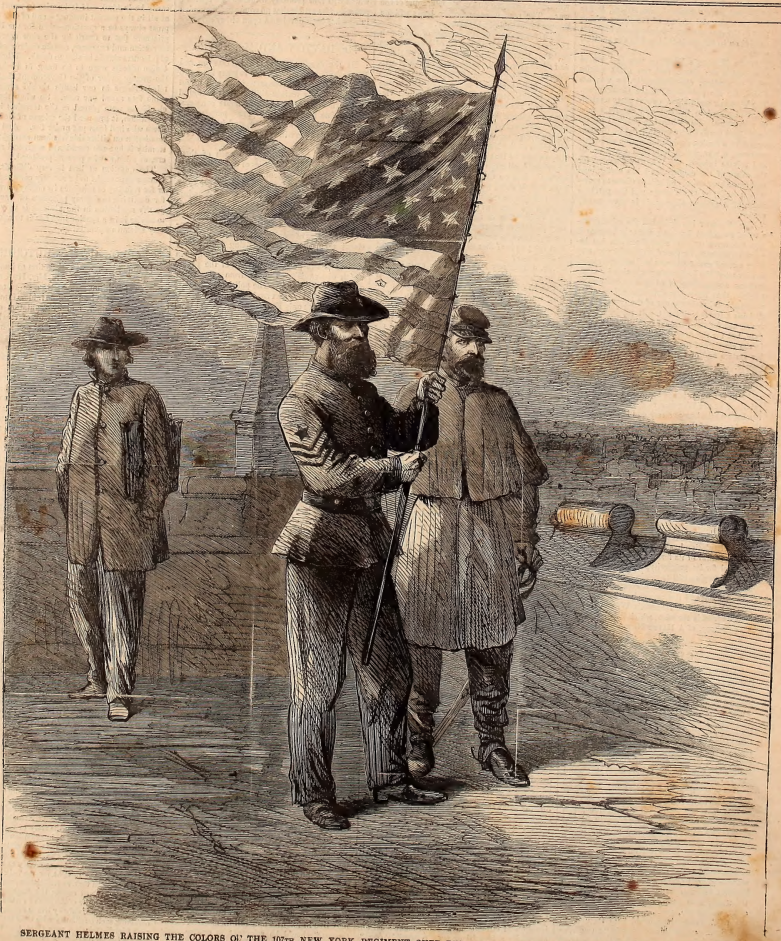
In the Editorial Columns political events have been the subject of abundant comment; and while it has been the aim of the Publishers to keep the WEEKLY free from partisan politics, they have not shrunk from independent criticism, nor hesitated to advocate that policy which seemed necessary in order to a lasting Peace and to the establishment of the Union on the eternal basis of Justice. They have believed Firmness to be the most essential element of a Genuine Conservatism. The Editorial Comments which have formed so prominent a feature of each week's issue, covering subjects of financial as well as political interest, would all together make two large-sized duodecimo volumes.

While HARPER'S WEEKLY has thus taken a decided part in the Political events of the day, it has not lost sight of its original design as a Literary Paper. Every Number has contained Tales, Poems, and Essays, by the ablest American and European writers.

The Circulation of the WEEKLY has steadily increased from the first. The average circulation for the past year has been largely over 100,000 copies per week. On some occasions over 200,000 copies have been sold of a single issue.

The Publishers have endeavored in the Past, as in the Future they will endeavor, to make the Paper indispensable to every intelligent reader and to every family fireside. As it has been a Pictorial History, for the last four years, of the War for the Union, so will no enterprise be spared hereafter to maintain the prestige it has already won. It will in the Future, as in the Past, occupy itself not with topics of petty interest, but with the grand, moving events of the age, justifying its well-earned title as "A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION."

The Publishers believe that the Paper possesses a permanent as well as temporary value. Every page has therefore been electrotyped, so that they are able at any time to supply any Volume or Number from the commencement.



Each Volume, containing all the Numbers for a year, commencing with the 1st of January, neatly bound in cloth, will be furnished for SEVEN DOLLARS, and will be sent by Express, freight paid by the Publishers, to any part of the United States reached by Express, within the distance of three thousand miles from New York.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 7, 1865.

THE NEW YEAR.

A HAPPY NEW YEAR! There are few faithful American citizens who can doubt that the new year will be a happy one, because it will see the virtual overthrow of the rebellion against the principle of free popular constitutional government; the restoration of the Union, and the destruction of the only present cause of national danger.

This is the moment of the year when men examine their moral, social, and financial accounts; when they form good resolutions; when some men begin new lives, and magazines and journals begin new volumes. The Ninth Volume of HARPER'S WEEKLY opens with this Number. Begun as a literary and social weekly journal with occasional illustrations, it has become a pictorial history of the times, taking part in the great national debate which has been carried on in the battle-field and in the political arena.

When HARPER'S WEEKLY was first issued party-spirit was fierce, and two great parties were contending, constitutionally, as was believed, for the possession of the Government. The WEEKLY maintained a strict party neutrality, and aimed to interest and entertain men of all parties. But when the political debate ended and cannon were annihilated by the war waged by a faction against the nation and Government, a war which imperiled every public and private interest, the WEEKLY declared for the cause of the country, and has maintained that cause ever since, and will continue to maintain it until, by God's grace and the patriotic valor of American citizens, it is permanently secure.

The WEEKLY has defended the administration of President LINCOLN not only because it was the constitutional administration, but because its measures for the salvation of the country have seemed entirely honest and generally wise. It advocated Mr. LINCOLN'S re-election for many reasons, a single one of which was sufficient—namely, that he represented the policy of an unconditional maintenance of the Government, and his adversary did not. It rejoices in the result not for the personal success of its candidate, but for the overwhelming evidence given in the election of the strength of the people in the last system and of the patriotic purpose of the people.

Grateful to the army and navy, by whose brave hands, aided by divine Providence, the great work is and still is fought, it has been the pleasure and privilege of the WEEKLY to depict the famous battles, and the heroes on sea and land, by which the salvation of the country is achieved. It has thus been in peaceful homes a constantly renewed monument of the bravery and suffering which preserved that peace, and in the camp and on the deck a regular messenger of the unfailing sympathy and interest with which the soldiers and sailors are followed at home. Without, the WEEKLY has not omitted its literary miscellany or its careful digest of news.

It is but another sign of the fidelity of the people to their own Government that the country of the paper has been so cordially approved, that its circulation has greatly increased despite the withdrawal of its former Southern support. Thankful for its prosperity, and for the cause of it, and hoping still to retain that public sympathy which springs from a common devotion to the Union and the principles of the United States Government, HARPER'S WEEKLY utters to all its friends the wish, which it believes will be a prophecy, of A HAPPY NEW YEAR!

SAVANNAH.

"LOOK out for me about Christmas," wrote SHERMAN as he began his great march into the West. Georgia, of which we present a series of illustrations to-day, and which culminated in the capture of Savannah upon the 22d December. The rebel General HARDEE, with the bulk of his army, escaped; but General SHERMAN captured one hundred and fifty guns, thirteen locomotives, one hundred and ninety cars, three steamers, a large quantity of ammunition and materials of war, and thirty-three thousand bales of cotton.

This is the triumphant completion of a campaign which, at its beginning, every one must have felt to be daring and dangerous, and which, seen from Europe, appeared in its just proportions as one of the great military movements of modern times. Its success was clearly seen to be the proof of fatal weakness in the rebel section and to foretell the doom of the rebellion—and it has succeeded. It is a success which can not be extenuated or explained away. General SHERMAN and his army moved from Chattanooga to Atlanta because neither JOHNSTON, nor HOOD, nor JEFFERSON DAVIS, nor the rebel Confederacy could help themselves. And SHERMAN and his men made "an impossible march" from Atlanta to Savannah because the people of Georgia did not care to help themselves. He masked his movement, indeed, so that the fat wits of soldiers like HOWELL COBB never knew where his main body was nor whither he was going. But if the people of Georgia had been "fired," as at some times during the war they have undoubtedly been, they would have desolated the whole region, the richest belt of Georgia, through which his course lay, and impeding his advance by the total destruction of roads, crops, and bridges, his march would have been delayed, and its issue most uncertain.

As it is, the campaign of SHERMAN from the first of May to the end of December, from Chattanooga to Savannah, is the most remarkable in American annals. The skill and celerity with which, by incessant strategy, he pushed Jomenor back upon his own ground, making that favorable for defense and carefully defended, and the equal skill with which, wrapping himself in a cloud, he passed resistlessly from Atlanta to the sea, will be a military study for ever shrewd to kindle admiration and surprise. The chapters of future history which recount this campaign will be the strangest and most romantic of the war. The man whose name it bears will be forever memorable in his country.

The consequence of the capture of Savannah is reverse that of the capture of New Orleans and Fort Donelson and Vicksburg and Atlanta and Chattanooga, of the opening of the Mississippi and the occupation of Missouri. Then the march from the north of the Rapidan to the south of the James and the Shenandoah victories and the terrible rout of HOOD—that is, the consequence is the suppression of the rebellion. JEFFERSON DAVIS declares that all such captures and successes are of no importance. His allies at the North echo his words. He said they were in fact what the rebels never mean to be subdued, all steps toward subduing them are useless. But we can not repeat too often that such talk is mere folly. Was the belligerent ever mean to be subdued? Do JEFFERSON DAVIS and his Northern parrots suppose that their loud vociferation of fighting to the death is a very persuasive argument, or that the march through Georgia made "agreeable" by the fact that the people of that State do not mean to fight to the death?

Mr. JEFFERSON DAVIS and his crew may be as gentlemanly and solemnly resolved as their Northern friends announce, but the laws of nature continue to operate remorselessly. And when the strategic points of the rebel section are held by the national army, and the rebel forces are dispersed, and the junction that established a long march is made, the war will dwindle into guerrilla fighting, and peace will gradually come again, as slowly, perhaps, but not less surely than Spring will follow this Winter.

JOHN BULL UPON SHERMAN.

THE most amusing reading of the day is the British press upon SHERMAN'S march. That it is a great feat of a great military genius is the general verdict, with all the chances in favor of the former view.

The London Saturday Review, for instance, the organ of the dilettante aristocratic sympathy with Slavery and the armed attempt to extend and confirm its deadly hold upon this continent, remarks, after a contemptuous sneer at its theory of the necessity and causes of the movement, a statement which is made with the evident fear of being overheard by the rebels that SHERMAN is baffled in his undertaking, the balance of advantage during the past year will have been largely in favor of the Confederates." That is a piece of news that will cheer the rebels will be duly grateful. "On the other hand," it continues, "Richmond would be in imminent danger if SHERMAN succeeded in reaching Beaufort with a large and effective army." Beaufort is almost impossible, against such an addition to the enemy's force, for LEE to maintain his communications with the South and with the West. Yet in the last resort, he could easily secure a retreat into Tennessee, where the Federals are already hard pressed by some of his officers"—General HOOD, for instance.

"The war," it continues, "would certainly not be terminated by the loss of Virginia, if [there be virtue in if] the entire country to the west of the mountains and to the frontier of Kentucky were occupied by the Confederates. ——If LEE were forced to evacuate Richmond, he would probably be able to reconquer Nashville, which is already annoyed, if not seriously threatened by the operations of Confederate detachments."

This "if" and "probably," the exact value of which we can now see, are the only crumbs of comfort the Saturday Review throws its rebel friends in the hour of their need.

On the other hand, the London Spectator, friendly to our Government, has a masterly review of the vast difficulties and dangers which beset SHERMAN'S march, "an episode calculated to make men who are not Americans hold their breath." It continues: "Only a singular combination of circumstances could render such an enterprise a hopeful or even a possible one;" and then proceeds to a careful review of the favorable chances. At the close of this the Spectator says that if SHERMAN takes Charleston or Savannah, "the South loses one more city, one more centre of supplies, one more cause for the confidence which supports her people. Her territory will have been traversed by an invading army from west to east, her noblest State will be threatened by a formidable invasion from south as well as north, and her whole power may, if the success is followed up, be cut in two. On the other hand, if General SHERMAN is defeated, the North loses her finest army and one of her most efficient Generals, but her territory, her people, and her resources remain absolutely intact. The risk in any view is a fearful one, but it is by the successful running of such risks that great campaigns are won and great Generals extort from the world unwilling recognition. There is not a General now alive in Europe who, if SHERMAN succeeds, will not recognize the addition of one more name to the short list of first-class leaders known to us."

SHERMAN has succeeded, and his success more than justifies the expectation of the Spectator, which will serve as a reminder of the opening remark of its article that no commanding genius in war has been developed upon either side.

MR. DAYTON AND MR. NOYES.

BY the death of WILLIAM L. DAYTON and WILLIAM CURTIS NOYES this country loses two of its most distinguished, characteristic, and useful citizens. Their various ability, their profound and earnest convictions, their noble consecration of fine powers to the purest purpose, are known to all who knew them, and in the story of this trying time will remain honored and conspicuous.

But there was especially in each of them the distinctive characteristics of our nationality. They were both of them men who believed in the original rights of men and the capacity of the people to make and maintain a constitutional government, and the consequent necessity of public education and the elevation of the public morality. Mr. DAYTON more than once decided a series of ministers who, either holding slaves themselves or apologizing for Slavery, could not possibly represent that faith in human rights and the political capacity of the people which distinguishes America from every other country in the world. The political and social philosophy of Mr. DAYTON'S immediate predecessors was not only European but mediæval and feudal, and no man who believed in the principle of the American Government, as held by JEFFERSON, could represent it in Paris, could fail to see that such persons as JOHN Y. MASON, WILLIAM C. RIVES, and CHARLES J. FAULKNER fundamentally disbelieved it.

JOHN SLIDELL remained in Paris to-day exactly the spirit, purpose, and political faith which were formerly represented by RIVES, MASON, and FAULKNER. The spirit and purpose which every human and liberal Frenchman who understands it sincerely despises, and a spirit which is essentially hostile to that of our Government. And the only real intelligences of American gamblers, slaveholders, adventurers, and old partisan tricksters, of whom JOHN SLIDELL is a type, the manly earnestness and honest courage and the political principles of WILLIAM L. DAYTON were as purifying as a north wind in the hot miasma of a swamp. He was himself a vindication of the spirit of the American Union and Liberty, as SLIDELL is an illustration of that of national ruin and slavery.

So likewise, in the city of NEW YORK, Mr. NOYES represented the same faith and showed it in his career. There was no wiser counselor in politics or in law. He was neither timid nor extravagant, and never failed upon due occasion to speak the truth in that tranquil sincerity and plain dignity which are finer than eloquence. Technically speaking, Mr. NOYES was not in public life; but when he was sent as a delegate from New York to the Peace Conference in 1861, his position was so purely patriotic, and all he said was so wise, and firm, and lofty that in the record of its meetings no truer statesman appears.

When such men die their country is bereaved. In a time of evil very their fall is like that of flood-gates in battle. For their harmonious lives and words inspire the faith and the courage which make armies irresistible, and confirm in the nation's heart that purpose which saves the nation and civil liberty together.

RETALIATION.

IF we were at war with cannibals who ate the slain prisoners whom they took from our armies, we should retaliate in kind. If we were fighting Indians who burned their captives at the stake, we could not retaliate in kind. We are at war with men whom the long habit of enslaving other men has inherited and barbarized, and who starve and freeze to death the prisoners who fall into their hands. Of the fact there can be no reasonable doubt. The testimony is conclusive. Nor is there any reason why men who do not hesitate in time of peace to force other men to work for them without wages, that they may live in luxury and call themselves "gentlemen," should be reluctant to expose their prisoners to starvation. It is not so barbarous to starve a prisoner who has been fighting against you as it is to whip a man to death because he will not work for you for nothing.

What ought to be done? It is a question which is constantly asked and is not easy to answer. It is estimated that we have some sixty thousand rebel prisoners, and that the rebels have about forty-five thousand loyal men in their hands. If we exchange them man for man we give the staggering rebellion a fresh army. That is one of the reasons of the rebel starvation of our men. Yet how can we relieve their unhappy condition if they are not exchanged?

Retaliation is a policy authorized by the customs of all nations. It has its limits of course. With us the object of retaliation would be to put an end to the torture of loyal men. But it could not use torture as a means. Northern men would not tolerate it. They are not used to seeing women whipped for so loving their children as to try to save them from being sold at the shambles, and they could not starve helpless men to death.

But if retaliation does not admit torture it does allow death. Retaliation need not necessarily be in kind. If it be wise to resort to it at all in the present instance—and of that there must always be a question—then for the Union prisoners put to death by the slow agony of starvation and exposure, certain designated rebel prisoners should be shot to death. When two Union officers were to be hung in Richmond the prompt order of the Government that two rebel officers in our hands should suffer the same fate saved our men. So when the rebel officers who are placed in the trenches before Charleston, it procured the release of Union officers who had been put under fire. And when retaliation on either side has been carried to extremity it has not occasioned a general massacre, as some unwise persons predicted.

The question at best is very difficult. No Government ought to be severely censured either for refusing to reinforce its enemy's army, or for declining to destroy prisoners of war. To justify retaliation in the abstract is very easy: to advise it in a specific instance is to assume a very solemn responsibility.

PARDON OF MRS. HUTCHINS.

IT would be a great satisfaction to know why the President has pardoned Mrs. HUTCHINS, a woman of Baltimore, who gave a sword to HARRY GILMORE, the leader of the raiders into Maryland last summer, and by reputation one of the most active and malignant of rebel emissaries and abettors. Upon trial and conviction she was sentenced a few weeks since to five years' imprisonment, and now she is turned loose again. There is in them no intimation that she is to be sent beyond the lines.

A woman like this Mrs. HUTCHINS may, and certainly does, give the information that MOSBY and every guerrilla marauder most desires, and which is of the utmost service to DAVIS and LEE at Richmond. From the beginning of the war, from Mrs. GREENHOW down to Mrs. HUTCHINS, women have been, because of their sex, the most useful agents of the traitors, and they have very seldom been punished, although in a few instances they have been sent to the rebels.

How many a precious, noble, loyal life have such women virtually taken! To how many massacres have they not directly shown the way! Of what infinite sorrow to private hearts, and of injury to the public welfare, have they not been the cause!

Of course in the absence of all other knowledge than the public announcements of Mrs. HUTCHINS'S arrest, trial, sentence, imprisonment for five years, and release at the end of five weeks, we have no right and no disposition to do more than suggest that in such cases it is very easy, and would greatly conduce to public satisfaction, if the Government would state briefly the reasons of the repeal. It would cost no more time or trouble than the announcement that a Colonel is promoted to be General for heroic conduct in a battle, and it would certainly greatly relieve the minds and hearts of those whose sons and brothers and friends are in the hands of HARRY GILMORE'S raid, to know why his accomplice is set free. The fact of the release gratifies Mrs. HUTCHINS'S friends. We hope the reason would satisfy the friends of her victims.

LITERARY.

"Arctic Researches and Life among the Esquimaux," by CHARLES LANMAN (HARPER & BROTHERS). This is a peculiarly fresh and delightful book. The childlike simplicity and earnestness of Mr. HALL give a charm to his words which recalls the Swiss Family Robinson and Robinson Crusoe. Living in Ohio, far from the sea, his mind and heart are interested by the story of the search for SIR JOHN FRANKLIN. His inquiries in repressed by the power of the absolute uncertainty that rests upon the explorer's fate, and he tells himself called to penetrate the mystery as early as my knight of old was called to fight for the holy sepulchre. He is persuaded that, as traditions of remote events had long survived among the Esquimaux, there must be true stories of the fate of FRANKLIN, which can be ascertained only by living among them, and by winning such familiarity with their language, and such friendly relations with them, that they would frankly tell all they knew. No police could tell the tale. He is sure that the truth lives only in the legends of the region. So the resolute, simple-hearted man makes his way to the sea-board; interests the friends of Arctic research; finally procures two vessels and a convenient boat, and sails for Greenland. He pushes further on into the icy kingdom of the Equimaux, with whom he domesticates himself after one of his vessels and his consorts are destroyed by a storm. Regarding his sojourn among the Equimaux, he devoted himself to learning the language and the life of the inhabitants, and returned home after two years' absence, to start anew with the advantages of the two years wisely spent in preparation upon the spot; and with that purpose sailed again last June, and is now fulfilling his plans near the Pole. This volume is the record of the two years' training. It contains not only the most striking incidents of adventure, told with inexpressible naiveté, but also the most interesting and comprehensive account of the Equimaux. MR. HALL is evidently of RAREY's opinion. Kindness is the surest key to confidence. His behavior in that Arctic zone is friendly, and he finds it so. His description of the Equimaux is very touching. The warmth of their affections and a mild delicacy of character make them very attractive. If MR. HALL does not find the fate of SIR JOHN FRANKLIN he will have discovered and revealed to us the inhabitants of the region; and we shall get a book heartily wishing that all the embassadors of civilization to the twilight races might be as sagacious, truthful, and devoted as this delightful traveler.

"The Queens of Song, etc.; to which is added a Chronological List of all the Operas that have been performed in Europe, by ELIZABETH STRATHMORE CLAYTON, with History, (HARPER & BROTHERS.) This is a collection of brief, entertaining biographies of all the most famous prime donne from Katherine Tofts, in 1703, when Opera was introduced in England, down to Louisa Pyne and Mademoiselle Tietjens, who are still living and singing. The memoirs are written with great spirit, and the whole is a capital "parlor-window book," or fireside companion. Its lively, chatty, gossipy style of curious and interesting details of private and national life. Many of the best mots of Sophie Arnould are preserved. She was one day that a Capuchin monk had been devoured by wolves, "Poor beasts!" said she, compassionately, "hunger must be a dreadful thing." Lady Craven's beauty, wit, and waywardness, who complained that she could not get rid of her lovers, Sophie said that she could easily do it if she chose, for the lady bought her fee to tell her how. "You have only to open your mouth and speak," was the reply. She met a doctor going to see a patient, and gave him her arm. "What, Doctor," said Sophie, "are your ordinary resources failing?" The American admirers of Alboni, of Rosio Nonny, Carlo Zannoni, Mrs. Wood, Zelia Maliban, Jenny Lind, Catherine Hayes, Piccolomini, and Louisa Pyne will find here plenty of pleasant information about all those Queens of Song.

"The Gentle Life" (WALTER LOW, New York). This is a neatly printed and bound in exquisite taste, a truly beautiful book, containing a series of brief and pleasant essays, which have been so popular that the first edition was quickly passed through several editions. They are so generally genial and agreeable that the writer should have spared us the remark that our appointment is a failure. But he had not heard from Georgia and Tennessee. Such remarks, however, are merely blemishes upon a book of flexible ease which are very sure to be welcome in all cultivated circles.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

BULLETINS OF THE HOSPITALS.

The lady whose countenance fell on the receipt of a telegram, stating that her husband would not be home from the city till late, has undergone an operation and is pronounced out of danger.

The eminent lawyer who inadvertently allowed his eye to rest for a moment on a point in the evidence with it, hoped, regain the use of the organ.

A small but interesting child was brought in the hospital a few days since. Its nose having been put out of plumb on the back of a brother. The little sufferer is progressing favorably.

The literary gentleman who was brought in suffering acutely from an idea which had accidentally entered his head has been trephined, and is in a fair way to recover.

Dumas has been teaching the French public how to dress a rabbit. If he is so eminently inclined he had better go to Congleton, where a distinguished personage will no doubt cook his goose for him.

Several country journmen have, we understand, combined to send a petition to MR. BANTING, asking him to point out the best way for them to diminish their toes.

A NEW FEMINOT.—The Paresis Delivery Company had recently a novelty intruded to their charge—a Lady wrapt up in her Baby.

THE NAME OF THE PUBLISHER OF MR. BANTING'S POEM.—M'Lean.

THE WAY HE WAS MISLED.—When James Beresford, author of "The Miseries of Human Life," was at the Charter-house School, he was a remarkably gay and noisy fellow; and one day, having played himself out of concert, the school says Southey) was so quiet without him that his absence was at once detected, and brought upon him a flogging.

A LEARNED IDIAR.—The ladies in Paris, we are informed, are relinquishing the golden tint they applied to their locks for one of a more decidedly fiery hue. Poor things! it is a pity that they are not better rabid instead of their hair.

"Molly," said Joe Kelly's ghost to his wife, "I'm in purgatory at this present," says he. "And what sort of a place is it?" says she. "Fair," says he, "'tis a sort of half-way house between you and heaven; and I stand it mighty easy after having you."

A MEDICAL QUESTION.—May people in perfect health, who have never abused their constitutions, be said to be "no better than they should be?"

"THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER."—"The worship of the 'Golden Calf!'"

HERE, who is a judge of morals as well as money, says that being tender to another man's wife is not a "legal tender."

A FITTING COMPARISON.—Another lady burnt to death last week! Considering the number of fatal accidents that have occurred to ladies' dresses, it is painfully true to say that a lady is never so literally "dressed to death" as when she is wearing Crinoline.

THERE'S SO MUCH ABOUT that.—A young lady, a few days ago, when asked wanting to be very charitable and persuasive—we will not divulge to whom—said, "I conjure you" to say yes. "Jane" you!

"A NINE DATE WONDER."—That of the kitten, which wonders when it'll see.

DOING THE LANGUAGE.—"Do you suppose that you can do the business?" said the master of the 2d said a manager to a needy actor in quest of an engagement. "I should think I might," was the reply. "I have done a great many landlords."

MOTTO FOR LUNATICS.—Out of sight and out of mind.

QUERIES FOR THE WIDE-AWAKE.—May not a bird who sleeps upon the wing be said to occupy a feather-bed?

HOW TO RENOVE WRINKLES.—It is said to be satisfactorily demonstrated that every time a wife scolds her husband she adds a wrinkle to her face! It is thought the most successful of this fact will have the most salutary effect, especially as it is understood that every time a wife smiles on her husband it will remove one of the old wrinkles!

"MR. Jones, you said you were connected with the fine arts: do you mean that you are a sculptor?" "No, sir, I don't scalp myself, but I furnish the stone to the man what does."

A man who lives almost exclusively upon tick—The telegraph operator.

If twenty grains make a scruple, how many will make a pint?

A DAUGHTER'S EPITAPH—His pill-grimage is o'er.

When is a lady's neck not a neck?—When it is a little bear (care).

"Setting a man trap" is the title given to the picture of a pretty young lady arranging her curls at a mirror.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE SITUATION.

The political news this week is unimportant. Congress adjourned December 19th, to January 2. Previous to adjournment it passed the bill creating the rank of Vice-Admiral, and the bill for the Pacific Railroad. The last bill, but its consideration was postponed until after the Holiday. The Senate has confirmed FARRAGUT's nomination adversely to the House bill to drop from the rolls all unemployed officers in the navy.

The military record for the week includes the capture of Savannah, the battle fought in another column, and the attack on Fort Fisher. The details will be given in connection with the operations of the armies in the accompanying number. General Thomas has advanced over twenty miles in pursuit of Hood, who is closely pressed. Hood. Steedman's Corps has been dispatched to Decatur, near which point it was reported that Forrest was massing, as the river is eighteen feet above the shoals, and Hood will find Forrest ready for crossing. The report that Davidson toward Mobile has not yet taken a sufficiently definite shape for report. Wilson's Cavalry is still in operative movements in North Carolina, and in the Valley of the Shenandoah.

CONGRESS.

December 20:

In the Senate, a bill was reported from the Committee on Finance, to put peace, and for the repeal of the time allowed for the withdrawal of certain goods from the public stores. The bill authorizing the Vice-Admiral was passed. It provides that the Vice-Admiral shall be selected from the list of Rear-Admirals, and shall be the ranking officer in the United States Navy. He will then rank next to the Lieutenant-General; and his salary is to be that of the Lieutenant-General; and his salary is fixed at $7500 per annum when at sea, $6000 when on shore, and $5000 when waiting orders. From the House bill to repeal the Adjutant-General reported a substitute for the House resolution, which provides that the repeal shall take effect twenty Treaty of June 5, 1854. The preamble of this resolution is simple statement of the fact that the treaty provides for its own continuance ten years from the date of the exposing such operation, and forbidding at the expiration of twelve months after either of the parties should give notice of its wish to terminate the same. The ten years close March 16, 1865.

In the House, a bill was reported from the Military Committee, and passed, providing for the amendment of the act of June 30, 1864, so as to allow officers absent at that time the privileges allowed to others of the same grade. A bill was passed providing for the abolition of the fourth section of the act for the transportation of goods in bonded to prevent the transportation of any newspapers, but also periodicals, magazines, and excluding one or more than twenty-five pounds. Delivery of Kansas to the eastern boundary of California without payment of further payment. The bill creating the office of Vice-Admiral was passed. The bill was signed December 21 by the Speaker, and immediately afterward nominated Rear-Admiral Farragut to be Vice-Admiral. The nomination was confirmed by the Senate the same day.

December 21:

In the Senate, the memorial of publishers, asking for an alteration of the law in regard to carrying periodicals at the reduced mail. The House bill providing that the increased tax on whisky should go into effect on the first Monday of February I was passed. This bill, which makes the tax on whisky $2 per gallon from January 1, 1865, was passed by nearly Twenty-six to eighteen Senator, who said that the people of the United States were willing to pay the higher rate for one year, and as there seemed to be great unanimity among the Senators he called for a division vote. In accordance with a wish of Mr. Hale, who desired to record his reject, the vote was taken by yeas and nays.

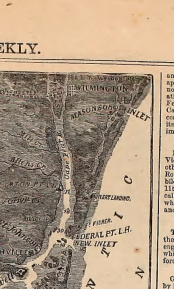
In the House, Mr. Washburne from Nevada was qualified and took his seat. It was voted that the Committee of Ways and Means examine into the expediency of reducing or suspending the import duty on printing paper. The bill was reported and passed calling on the President of War to lay before the House all unpublished communications relative to the retaking of Galveston.

December 22:

In the Senate, Mr. Wilson from the Military Committee reported adversely to the House bill to drop from the rolls all officers in the Army. A joint resolution was also had been offered during the last session, requiring lawyers before the United States Courts to take the oath of allegiance. The Senate adjourned till January 5, 1865.

In the House, there was no session.

GENERAL THOMAS'S CAMPAIGN.



After the battles of December 15 and 16 Thomas still continued the pursuit of Hood, who was in full retreat in advance. Six miles from Franklin an engagement occurred between the cavalry forces of the two opposing armies in which the rebels were routed. Sunday night, the 18th, the railroad ran to Franklin, from which point Thomas was still pushing on. He that day captured three hundred prisoners, among whom was Brigadier-General Quarles. The next day the roads were obstructed by heavy rains, but still these rains also revelled the Duck and Tennessee rivers, which lay in Hood's front. On the 20th Spring Hill was passed, and Hood's rear-guard passed Duck River, having nearly reached the Tennessee by Pulaski. Hood, leaving a large portion of his artillery and train behind him, will probably attempts to cross the river at higher above Florence. Two regiments and four guns went toward Florence as far as to Lexington. Chatham went toward Florence as far as to Lexington. Chatham went toward Lawrenceburg, on the same road, and then struck westward, leaving his ammunition behind. Reports from the people indicate that the rebels were suffering greatly. The rebel General Buford was reported severely wounded, also General Lee. Since Hood started on the 18th he has lost eighteen Generals, killed, wounded, and captured; a loss of sixty-eight per cent in rank acknowledged. A dispatch from General Thomas, dated 6 P.M. December 25, states that Harrison's brigade, pressing closely, came upon a rebel force of four or five thousand men, protected by Wilkinson's command, and being compelled to fall back lost one gun. Harrison subsequently captured the position, but not the gun. Wilson and the Fourth Corps were still in pursuit. Steedman was at this time moving on Decatur, a point on the Tennessee, where it appeared that the rebels were about to cross. He was within seven miles of the place. Stragglers from Hood's army were being brought in continually.

Up to this time the battle was going on at Nashville on the 15th Forrest and Rousseau were engaged at Murfreesborough. The former was beaten with a loss reported at 2000 men.

General Lyon, who had crossed the Cumberland some days before Lake Kentucky, was now pursued by General M'Cook, but as latest accounts no decisive engagement had occurred. General Lyon's force is estimated at from two to three thousand cavalry, with six pieces of artillery. He had struck the Louisville and Nashville Railroad at Elizabethtown, and from that point had preceded north toward Hudgenville's Hill, south of Louisville.

THE ATTACK ON FORT FISHER.

From Richmond papers we learn that Porter's fleet, estimated by the rebels at fifty vessels, including two ironclads, made a "furious" attack on Fort Fisher about 1 P.M., December 24, and was continued through the day, and repeated the next day at 10 o'clock A.M. The enemy admits a loss of twenty-three wounded the first day. Under cover of a heavy fire Butler had succeeded in landing above the fort with his military division, consisting of portions of the Twenty-fourth and Twenty-fifth Corps. General Butler's command still held its ground, although it had been repulsed in an assault on the fort. From a report which comes from Northern, dated the 26th, it appears that during the night of the 25d a terrible explosion occurred. This was doubtless the explosion of the Louisiana, which had been laden with 300 tons of gunpowder, and exploded in front of Fort Fisher previous to the near approach of the fleet. The rebel reports, however, make no mention of this fact, though they admit that the attack on the fort is precarious. Fort Fisher is situated on Federal Point, on the north bank, and at the mouth of Cape Fear River, twenty miles below Wilmington. It commands the approach to Wilmington by New Inlet, and its capture will insure a complete blockade of that most important port.

TOWARD MOBILE.

Last week we gave an account of Dana's raid from Vicksburg. At the same time with that expedition another was undertaken by General Davidson from Baton Rouge, who appears to have been operating around Mobile. He had reached Pascagoula December 14. On the 11th Governor Watts, of Alabama, issued a proclamation calling upon the people of the State to defend Mobile, which he said was threatened with attack from the land and water. He complains that he has not enough men.

FROM THE SHENANDOAH.

There is no strong Federal or Confederate force now in the Valley, and what still remains is mostly cavalry. An engagement occurred on the 19th near Strasburg, in which a portion of Custer's cavalry was outnumbered and forced to retire.

NEWS ITEMS.

General Sherman, in his march through Georgia and by his capture of Savannah, has freed over 30,000 slaves.

Samuel H. Young, the leader of the St. Albans raiders, with two accomplices, were acquitted December 21, at St. Francois, which point they had reached on their way to New Brunswick. Governor-General Monck has issued a proclamation offering a reward for the rearrest of the three guys.

Three of the St. Albans raiders made their escape from the Montreal jail, considering themselves in the safe cross the line. They then proceeded to Lebanon, New Hampshire, and enlisted, receiving the bounty, hoping to get back to Dixie at Uncle Sam's expense. They were, however, apprehended, and are now in the State prison at Concord. A considerable amount of money was found in their possession. Another one of the raiders was arrested in Toronto December 27.

MAJOR-GENERAL Sherman's youngest child, six months old, died recently at South Bend, Indiana, at the residence of Speaker Colfax. The General's eldest child sleeps in a couple in the Catholic College in the vicinity of that town.

Mr. Anson Wallace, Wallack, the proprietor of the well-known theatre that bears his name, died at his residence in this city on Sunday last, the 26th of December.

In Italy martial law has been abolished in the insurrectionary districts.

The Frankfort Diet on the 5th carried the Austro-Prussian proposition for the immediate evacuation of Holstein by Lauenburg by the Federal troops, the vote standing 9 against 7. Bavaria, Wurtemburg, and Darmstadt voted against this minority. The Commissioners of the two Powers already acting in Schleswig will also assume the administration in Holstein and Lauenburg.

Spain has suppressed all monastic institutions in Portugal. Instructions to this effect reached Warsaw November 11. In that capital the suppression took place as follows:—Punctually at midnight a colonel, with a battalion of troops, repaired to each religious house, assembled the monks, read to them the Viceroy's order, and ordered them to get ready to leave in half an hour, by railway, to a foreign country. Of the twelve religious establishments in Warsaw three were exempted, upon condition that they should receive no more novices, and die out by gradual suppression.

Of the 185 monasteries and 42 convents in Poland confiscated 1655 monks and 699 nuns, 71 monasteries, with 304 monks, and four convents, with 140 nuns, were left in possession of the monastical rules, which ordain that, for the better observance of discipline, each religious house shall contain at least eight monks or more. Many of those houses have found means of supporting the Insurrection, of concealing bands and individual insurgents, of containing arms and secret printing-presses, and of corresponding for all the canonical associations of inmates, in containing 24 monks, have been converted or open and distinctly proved participation in the insurrection.

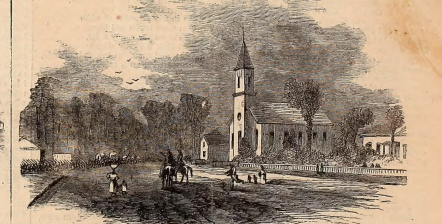
SHERMAN'S MARCH THROUGH GEORGIA.

WE devote a large portion of our present Number to the graphic and interesting illustrations of General SHERMAN's march through Georgia, which we have received from our special artist, Mr. THEODORE R. DAVIS. Such a military event has not occurred in history since NAPOLEON's celebrated but ill-omened march from Warsaw to Moscow in 1812. That adventure resulted in the destruction of a noble army, not by the force of the enemy met on the field of battle, but by the necessities of hunger and cold encountered in the desert wastes of a Russian winter. The record of General SHERMAN's march covers exactly the period of a single month, and extends over a distance of more than three hundred miles, passed through the heart of the enemy's country; but it terminates in perfect success. It is hardly possible to overestimate the importance of this success; and yet it dwindles into insignificance when compared with the promised victories to which it is preliminary.



Ever since this war began the rebels have lavishly exhausted their strength by the audacity of their offensive policy. To be able with some show of forces to threaten the capture of Washington or a march to the banks of the Ohio gave the Confederacy a bold front, which imparted confidence to its friends at home and abroad, and was intended to convince the loyal States of the hopelessness of the war. Not accomplishing this latter purpose, it failed of any substantial benefit. JEFFERSON DAVIS has persisted in this spendthrift habit of waging war until he has entirely exhausted the white population of the South, and is now advised by the highest military authority in the Confederacy to conscript negro slaves. His injudicious policy has resulted in as great loss of material as of men. Taking merely the last two months—from October 17 to December 17—the offensive campaigns of HOOD, EARLY, and PRICE, have cost the Confederacy, if we include the capture of Savannah, over three hundred and fifty guns and forty thousand men. Of these forty thousand men three-fourths have been captured on the battle-field. Twenty-five rebel generals also have been put out of combat by death, capture, or wounds. While HOOD was flying to the banks of the Tennessee in complete rout, SHERMAN was entering Savannah, and by his capture of that city had subtracted 20,000 souls from the Confederate population, had taken eighteen millions worth of cotton, and had gained the line of the Savannah River, for DAHLGREN's benefit, thereby insuring the speedy capture of Augusta. Yet this enormous sacrifice was for nothing: the campaigns in the Shenandoah, in Tennessee, and Missouri have all failed disastrously; and they can never be repeated.

HOOD's campaign was the most disastrous of all. LEE had been placed by GRANT's summer campaign in a position where he was utterly helpless to relieve the Confederacy. All hope rested with HOOD and BEAUREGARD. SHERMAN had flankanced to SHERMAN's advance. What followed has already become history. HOOD was defeated by THOMAS. And SHERMAN, unable of course to stay in Atlanta, exchanged the great railroad centre of Georgia for the possession of the railroads themselves. With nothing in his front he did in forty days what in the ordinary course of the war it would have taken many months to perform. He destroyed hundreds of miles of railroad, destroyed stores essential to the Confederate armies captured one of the four great sea-board cities which yet belonged to the enemy, and, more than all, destroyed ed JOHNSTON out of half a dozen strong-holds from Dalton to Atlanta, and had manœuvred HOOD out of Atlanta itself. In the natural course of events Atlanta would have been made, like Nashville, a great military post, from which offensive operations would have been pushed forward toward the coast. But HOOD's advance northward made this unnecessary, and took from Atlanta all its importance. Leaving THOMAS with a portion of his army to confront HOOD, SHERMAN with the better half determined to prosecute an independent campaign. HOOD's advance had accomplished two things: it had taken from Atlanta all its value as a conquest; it had also taken from HOOD's army all its value as a resistthe confidence of the rebels in the power of their Government to defend them.

As soon as SHERMAN was satisfied that HOOD was moving westward into Tennessee, and after having pursued him as far as to Gaylesville on the Chattooga River, he made his preparations for marching. STANLEY with the Fourth Corps, and SCHOFIELD with the Twenty-third, were sent north to co-operate with THOMAS, and the main army fell back to Rome. Then Rome was evacuated, and all its stores and machinery sent North. The army moved South. At Cartersville the telegraph wire was broken and all communication with the North severed. The last message was to THOMAS, saying, "All is well."

CAPITOL AT MILLEDGEVILLE, GEORGIA.

MADISON, GEORGIA.

MAGAZINE AT MILLEDGEVILLE, GEORGIA.

DESTRUCTION OF MADISON STATION, GEORGIA, DECEMBER 3, 1864.

At Marietta, November 13, General SHERMAN reviewed KILPATRICK'S cavalry division, which had been organized to accompany the grand expedition. Our artist sends us a spirited sketch of the scene, taken at the moment when General KILPATRICK, riding at the head of the whole column, came up to where General SHERMAN with his staff was waiting for the troops to pass in review. Saluting the latter, General KILPATRICK then took position on his right and the long column rode slowly by, each squadron in its order. To the right is the camp, and as there is room for significant comment upon the deadly earnestness of the scene, otherwise so brilliant and imposing, clouds of smoke were seen from the burning of the city, most of which was destroyed by fire. SHERMAN, superbly mounted, was the life of the spectacle. The fine soldierly appearance and spirited movements of the division met his admiring approval, and fully answered the question put by him to KILPATRICK, "Whether he (General KILPATRICK) had a division of cavalry?"

Leaving columns of smoke behind them, and destroying the railroad from Kingston, the advance column moved on to Atlanta. Here, also, every thing valuable to the enemy was committed to the flames. In the evening of November 15 only a brigade of Massachusetts soldiers were left in the town, and while the air hurtled with flame from burning buildings which covered an area of two hundred acres, the band of the Thirty-third Massachusetts played "John Brown's soul is marching on." Early the next morning was well on its way eastward across the State, moving two grand columns—HOWARD with the Fifteenth and Seventeenth Corps on the right, and SLOCUM with the Fourteenth and Twentieth on the left. The expedition consisted of not less than fifty thousand veteran soldiers. If the spectacle of the march was hidden from our eyes, it was equally veiled from rebel vision. KILPATRICK'S cavalry hung like a mass of cloud about SHERMAN'S columns, so mystifying the rebel authorities by their movements this way and that way that they never could discern the locality of SHERMAN'S main body. The New Macon was threatened, and while CONN'S militia was concentrating at that place and BEAUREGARD was hastening to the same, having come from Pollard, Rowan and Anderson passed the point of danger, and CORSE at Griswoldville on the 22d caught a passing glimpse of his rearguard. CORSE, we may have dashed against to their satisfaction, losing more than two thousand men. Before the 30th both columns had passed the Ocmulgee without opposition. Macon kept the railroad after crossing as far as to Madison, which was occupied on the 19th. The town is said to be the most prosperous in Georgia. Here the railroad buildings and store-houses were destroyed, and the column, then leaving the railroad, moved south to Milledgeville.

Just north of the city Little River was crossed. Here the mill was in operation, and our soldiers said it to grind corn which they had foraged. The Legislature had been in session at the capitol; but on the approach of SHERMAN'S left wing, the exodus of which members previously not to have been suspected, that body was seized with a panic which quickly spread among the citizens, followed by scenes of the wildest confusion. The cars were heaped with frightened citizens, and a thousand dollars was a cheap price for a buggy. The Georgians made considerable fun of their much-abused Governor BROWN, who seemed to be cooler than the rest of them and took good care to ship his own bagga. A pon entering the town one fine morning the colors of the One Hundred and Seventh New York were raised over the capitol, and General SHERMAN took up his head-quarters in Governor BROWN'S mansion, from which the furniture had all been removed. The next day, the 23d, the right wing under HOWARD had reached Gordon, just south from Milledgeville. It was near this point that the battle of Griswoldville, above alluded to, was fought. This was the most serious fight on the march. Only a brigade of infantry and a detachment of cavalry were engaged on the Federal side. General WOLCOT was in command. About five thousand militia, with which were mingled some of HARDEE'S men from Savannah, attacked our breast-works, and were repulsed with a loss on their part of 2500 men, 300 of whom were left dead on the field.

Then the OCONEE was crossed by SLOCUM'S column, when it was found that WHEELER had also crossed and was moving the approaches to Sandersville, to which point he was steadily driven by the advancing column. HOWARD, in the mean while, was attempting to cross the Oconee lower down at the Central Railroad bridge with a rebel cavalry force under WAYNE in his front. This force was of miscellaneous composition, being made up of WHEELER'S cavalry, Georgia militia, and a band of convicts in their prison garb whom Governor BROWN had released on condition that they would help defend the Confederacy. However, in spite of this formidable array, HOWARD crossed with little difficulty.

The army had set out with sixteen days' rations, but it was found that the country furnished supplies in abundance. The cattle-drains were so large that it was difficult to manage them, and a great plenty of turkeys placed SHERMAN'S army on a par with GEN. LEE'S at the time of the latter's proposed "Hard tack" became a by-gone institution. After crossing the Oconee also there was no more approhension of low water, as the sandy soil rapidly absorbs the most abundant falls of rain, rather benefiting the roads than injuring them. The people were found to be very ignorant, even the better of them. A large number of the able-bodied negroes joined the march.

Thus the two columns marched on by roads parallel to the Georgia Central Railroad toward the Ogechee River. KILPATRICK moved on the left flank, still keeping the rebels by feints on their guards. November 30 the whole army, with the exception of the Fifteenth Corps, had crossed the Ogeehee without fighting a battle. KILPATRICK had already advanced to Millen, but had failed to find any of our prisoners there. Our prisoners had been kept for some time at Millen, four miles distant from Millen Junction. The Junction was completely destroyed by General SHERMAN; no vestige of the place remains. The prison-pen at Millen was built of large logs driven into the ground, with sentry-posts on the top at short intervals. No shelter whatever was afforded to the prisoners, who burrowed in the earth. The pen was commanded by a fort, which appears in the sketch on the right. The square buildings shown in the sketch are ovens. And inside the inclosure, in the left-hand corner, which was called the dead line, WHEN GEORGE N. BARNARD, whose sketches of the prison-pen are here reproduced, was at that place he saw our dead soldiers lying unburied, as shown in the illustration. The grave-yard near by showed that over 700 of our men had been buried, the rebels from smooth whose pretending branches, partly shown in the fore-ground, upon a sort of bluff overlooking the mill and the Ogeechee, and on the left by the Savannah River. On the 13th Fort M'Allister was captured, acknowledged by the rebel authorities in their dispatches; and on the 14th the Savannah was occupied. The grand march had been then consummated; its grand object—the establishment of a base on the sea-coast—having been accomplished. This success was gained at a loss of about 1500 men, but without the sacrifice of a single wagon or a single gun.

BLESSINGS OF THE SWORD.

Down comes the snow, the fleecy snow,
Soft flutters on the sea,
And decks in friendly robes of white
The chill earth brown and bare.
It spreads o'er all the empty fields,
Each naked stalk it kindly shields;
And the beautiful snow, the heaven-born snow,
Covers the shivering earth below.

Down floats the snow, the pure white snow,
On angel wings of light,
And folds them over Autumn's gloom,
And hides her path from sight.
By dry brown gutte in the hill-
Not one is left out in the cold;
And the beautiful snow, the heaven-born snow,
Rests with the shelter of God.

Down falls the snow, the pretty snow,
Like flowers in heaven grown;
Pale garlands for the old Year's brow,
By night they have blown.
It decks the forest trees forlorn,
Of all their summer beauty shorn;
And the beautiful snow, the heaven-born snow,
Blooms on the stricken earth below.

Down comes the snow, the love-like snow,
Like answer to our prayers,
God sure will send, if we but wait
And cast on him our cares.
For righteousness and peace shall meet,
And o'er our land in love shall greet,
As the beautiful snow, the heaven-born snow,
Kisses the unclean earth below.

THE EXPERIENCE OF A POOR RELATION.

THE evening was raw and there was snow on the side-streets, gentlemen were passing, half-thawed, and trodden, and defiled with mud. I remembered it well, that snow, though it was fifteen years since I had last seen its cheerless face. There it lay, in the same old ruts, and spreading the same old snares on the side-paths. Only a few hours arrived in America in South Southampton, I sat in my room at Morley's Hotel, Charing Cross, and looked gloomily out at the fountains, which I could not hear, and their discontentedly, and fiercely tried my best to feel glad that I was a wanderer no more, and that I had indeed got home at last.

I poked up my fire, and took a long look backward upon my past life, through the embers. I remembered how I had been a spectator, and similar to my own, but with a small difference, that I was absolutely dependent upon my rich and respectable uncle, whose ruling passion was vain-glory, had looked on my existence as a nuisance, not so much because he was obliged to open his purse to pay for my clothing and education, as because that, when a man of his pretensions reflects on credit upon his name. I remembered how in those days I had a soul for the beautiful, and a certain always-awakened sense of the impotent hopes that consumed rather than cheered me—the hopes of name and gold, won by my own exertions, with which I should yet wring from those who despised me the worthless respect which they denied me now.

Sitting there at the fire, I rang the bell, and the waiter came to me; an old man whose face I remembered. I asked him some questions. Yes, he knew Mr. George Rutland; recollected that many years ago he used to stay at Morley's when he came to London. The old gentleman had always staid there. But Mr. George was too grand for Morley's now. The family always came to town in the spring, but, at this season, "Rutland Hall, Kent," would be pretty sure to be "engaged."

Having obtained all the information I desired, I began forthwith to write a letter:

"DEAR GEORGE,—I dare say you will be astonished to see my handwriting as you would to behold an apparition from the dead. However, you know I was always a never-do-well, and I have come back to England to die yet. I am ashamed not to be able to announce myself as having returned home with my fortune made; but mishaps will follow the most hard-working and well-meaning. I am still a young man, even though fifteen of the best years of my life may have been spent, and I am willing to devote myself to any worthy occupation. Meantime, I am anxious to see you and yours. A long absence from home and kindred makes one value the grasp of a friendly hand. I shall not wait for your reply to this, but go down to Kent the day after to-morrow morning. I believe, about dinner-time. You see I am making myself assured of your welcome for a few weeks, till I have time to look about me.

"I remain, dear George,

"Your old friend and cousin,

"GUY RUTLAND."

I folded this missive and placed it in its envelope. "I shall find out, once for all, what they are made of," I said, complacently, as I wrote the address, "George Rutland, Esq., Rutland Hall, Kent."

It was about seven on a frosty evening when I arrived at the imposing entrance of Rutland Hall. No Cousin George came rushing out to meet me. "Of course not," I thought; "I am unused to these kind of honours in this country. He is lying in wait for me on the mat inside." I was admitted by a solemn person as quietly and mechanically as I had given my instruction to my home and kindred were a thing that had happened regularly in his presence every day since his birth. He ushered me into a grand hall, but no mat supported the impatient feet of the dignified master of the house. "Mr. Rutland is at home, sir," said the solemn person, as I stood, even this, perhaps, were scarcely etiquette. No doubt he stands chafing on the drawing-room hearth-rug, and thinks it quite enough reason to make myself presentable before dinner." So, resigning myself to circumstances, I meekly followed a guide who volunteered to conduct me to the room assigned to my especial use. I had to travel a considerable distance before I reached it. "Is this the way to Mr. Rutland's?" when I did reach it, "I had expected to find the rooms in such a house more elegantly appointed than this!"

I made my toilet, and again submitting myself to my guide, was conveyed to the drawing-room door. Up a few marble stairs I had been coming pleasant speeches with which to greet my kinsfolk. I am not a brilliant person, but I sometimes succeed very well when I try, and on this occasion I had the desire to do my best.

The drawing-room door was at the distant end of the hall to the left, and right in the blaze of its warmth a little figure was lounging in an easy-chair. The little figure was a girl of apparently about fifteen years of age, dressed in a short shabby black frock, who was evidently spoiling her eyes by reading by the firelight. She had pushed her curls back, a mass of fair curly hair being thus tossed over the velvet cushion on which it rested, while she held her book close to the light. She was luxuriating in her solitude, and little dreaming of interruption.

She was so absorbed in her book, the door had opened and closed so noiselessly, and the room was so large, that I was obliged to make a sound to engage her attention. She started violently then, and looked up with a nervous fearfulness in her face. She dropped her book, sat upright, and put out her hand, as if expecting a thing I had not noticed before, and which leaned against the chair—a crutch. She then got up leaning on it and stood before me in the light. She was lame, and had two crutches by her.

I introduced myself, and her fear seemed to subside. She asked me to sit down, with a prim little assumption of at-home-ness, which did not sit upon her with ease. She picked up her book and laid it on a table; she produced a nest from the recesses of her chair, and with a blush gathered up the curls and tucked them into its mesh-work. Then she sat down, and kept her hand upon her crutches, as if she was ready at a moment's notice to limp away across the carpet, and leave me to my own resources.

"Thomon thought there was nobody in the room," she said, as if anxious to account for her own presence there. "I always stay in the nursery, except sometimes when they all go out and I get this room to myself. Then I like to read by the fire."

"Mr. Rutland is not at home?" I said.

"No, they are all out dining."

"Indeed! Your papa, perhaps, did not get my letter?"

She blushed crimson.

"I am not a Miss Rutland," she said. "My name is Tercie Ray. I am an orphan. My father was a friend of Mr. Rutland, and he takes care of me for charity."

The last word was pronounced with a certain controlled quiver of the lip. But she went on.

"I don't know about the letter, but I heard a gentleman was expected. I did not think it could be to-night, though, as they all went out."

"A reasonable conclusion to come to," I thought, and therefore began mentally in the eagerness of welcome displayed by my affectionate Cousin George. If I were the gentleman expected, they must have received my letter, and in it were fully set forth the day and hour of my proposed arrival. "Ah! George, my dear fellow!" I said, "you are not a well-bred host."

Arriving at this conclusion, I raised my glance, and met, full, the observant gaze of a pair of large brown eyes. My little hostess for the time being was regarding me with such a curiously legible expression on her face, that I could not but read it and be amused. It said plainly: "I know more about you than you think, and I pity you. You come here with expectations which will not be fulfilled. There is much mortification in store for you. I wonder you came here at all. If I were once well outside those gates I should never peep inside them again. If I knew a road cut into the world you come from, I would set out bravely on my crutches. No, not even for the sake of a golden hour like this, in a velvet chair, would I remain here."

How any one glance could say all this was a riddle; but it was by all this, and the language of the face was as simple to me as though every word had been translated into my ear. Perhaps it is certain eternal laws, kindred to those by which the little orphan was born, or George Rutland had become owner of Rutland Hall, assisted me in deciphering a much inferior order of reality. However that may be, certain things before surmised became assured facts in my mind, and a moist heart of sympathy became at once established between me and my companion.

"Tercie Ray," I said, "what do you think of a man who, having been abroad for fifteen years, has the impudence to come home without a shilling in his pocket? Ought he not to be stoned alive?"

"I thought how it was," said she, shaking her head and looking up with a wonder at her shrewd glances. "I knew it, when they put you into such a bad bedroom. They are keeping all the good rooms for the visitors who are coming next week. The house will be full for Christmas. It won't do," she added, meditatively.

"What won't do?" I said.

"Your not having a shilling in your pocket. They'll find it out, and you'll find out they will find it out. I have a guinea that old Lady Thornton gave me on my birthday, and if you like to borrow it, you can. I'll lend it you, and if I don't want it at all, and you could pay me back when you are better off."

She said this with such business-like gravity, that I felt obliged to control my inclination to laugh. She had evidently taken me under her protection. Her keen little wits saw my causes and difficulties besetting my steps during my stay at Rutland Hall, to which my newer eyes, and unaccustomed glances be ignorant. I looked at her with amusement, as she sat there seriously considering my financial interests. I had a desire to humor this quaint paternal relation that had sprung up so spontaneously between us. I said, gravely:

"I am much obliged to you for your offer, and will gladly take advantage of it. Do you happen to have the guinea at hand?"

She looked, her crutches, and then quickly out of the room. Presently she returned with a little bonbon box, which she placed in my hand, saying, "I found one guinea, wrapped up carefully in silver paper.

"I wish it had been more!" she said, wistfully, as I counted it transferred it to my pocket, box and all. "But I so seldom get money!"

At this moment the solemn person who had escorted me hither and thither before announced that my dinner was served.

On my return to the drawing-room, I found, to my disappointment, that my little confidential bird had flown. Tercie Ray had limped off to the nursery.

Next morning, at breakfast, I was introduced to the family. I found them, on the whole, pleasant people. I had expected that Cousin George had developed into a pompous portly paterfamilias; and, in spite of his cool professional engagements, was evidently anxious to see me. The Mamma Rutland just countenanced me, in a manner the most frigidly polite. The grown-up young ladies treated me with the most well-bred negligence. Unless I had been very obtuse, I should have perceived that I was to occupy the place appointed for me in Rutland Hall. I was expected to sit below the salt, and dine with the children's governess of no importance. George amused himself with me for a few days, displaying to me his valuable establishments, and also his various stables of grander guests, left me to my own resources. The Misses Rutland endured my escort on their riding excursions, but generally contrived to have cavaliers appeared. As for the lady of the house, her annoyance at having me quartered indefinitely on her premises, was quite apparent. The truth was, they were new people in the circle in which they moved, and it did not suit them to have a poor relation coming suddenly among them, calling them "cousin," and making himself at home in the house. For me, I was not blind, neither was I deaf, to all these things that we see. I made myself as comfortable as was possible under the circumstances, took every sneer and snub in excellent part, and was at amiable and satisfied on all occasions as though I believed myself to be the most cherished inmate of the like the rest of their hospitality, and smiled contentedly as the days went on. The gloom which had oppressed me on my first arrival in England had all broken itself away. How could I feel otherwise than supremely happy at finding myself thus surrounded by my kind relations, being so constantly entertained under their hospitable roof?

As I found that the guests at Rutland Hall enjoyed a much freedom in their choice of amusements, and the disposal of their time, I speedily availed myself of this privilege. I selected my own associates, and I entertained myself as pleased me best. Not finding myself always welcomed in the drawing-room, I returned, by a series of the most dexterous artifices, to gain the free entree of the nursery. In this nursery grew together the sons of five or six younger branches of the Rutland family. After a certain hour in the day none of the elders ever thought of invading its remote precincts. Five o'clock in the evening was the children's tea hour, and the pleasantest, I thought, in the twenty-four. There was a maid woman, who knew how to appreciate a little present now and again, and to keep her own counsel on the subject. The visits were to the pleasant children; they were unruly mischievous little wretches. They conceived a sort of affection for me, because I sometimes made the nursery nasty-dirty purchases made during solitary rides; pictur-books, tops, dolls, or sweetmeats, procured by means of the "tuck-shop." I was, however, as much to Teecie one evening as she sat by, watching the distribution, and she nodded her head in quiet satisfaction. She thought that I economized my substance very well. It covered a great many small extravagances, that guinea did.

Whatever might be my position at Rutland Hall, Teecie Ray's was simply intolerable. A spirit less tamed would have been cowed and broken by it: a nature less delicate must have been blunted and made coarser. The servants openly neglected her, the children used her as they pleased; wreaked their humors on her, sparing neither blow nor taunt in their passion, and demanding from her at all times whatever service is suited their capricious fancy to need. Nurse, the only woman who ever showed a grain of consideration for the orphan, would sometimes shield her from their impish attacks, when she could do so with safety to herself; but she was not permitted to deal with those darlings in the only fashion which would have been at all likely to teach them reason. As for the elders of the house, Teecie Ray's momentary presence, or the mere mention of her name, was sufficient to rob them quite of mind. "What is to be done with that girl?" I heard Mrs. Rutland remark to one of her daughters. "If she were not literally starved, set her to earn her bread in some way; but, as it is——" A shrug of the shoulders, and a certain visage-like expression of countenance, which this lady knew how to assume, sufficiently developed the idea thus imperfectly expressed.

And how did she get on with all this? She did not complain nor rebel, she did not sulk nor fret. Under that well-worn black frock of hers she carried a little breastplate of sober determined endurance. When sorely tried, there was never any cowardly submission to be seen in her grave little face, nor did I ever hear her in her manner or words either reproach or remonstrance. She simply endured. Her large patient eyes and mute mouth seemed to say: "Whatever I suffer, whatever I long to dare, gratitude shackles my limbs, and seals my lips. I am saved from many things; therefore I am dumb."

The second time I met my little benefactress, was on a day or two after our first interview in the drawing-room. I came upon her, one afternoon by chance, limping down a hedge lane that lay to the back of the house, away beyond the gardens, and the kitchen gardens, and the pleasure-grounds. Here, I found, led to a large meadow, and beyond the meadow there was a wooded hill, and far down at the distant side of the hill there was a village. This was Teecie Ray's favorite ramble, and her own avenue of escape from the torments of the nursery. I immediately began pressing on her the subject of perplexities, troubles and difficulties, to all of which she listened with perfect credulity, expressing her sympathy as I went along by an expressive nod of the head, or a shrewd swift glance. Then she gave me her wise little counsel when all was told, and went home, I believe, pondering on my case.

As the days passed, and my relations became more and more established in their winter guests, I found myself more and more thrown upon my own resources for amusement. Occasionally I was included in an invitation, and accepted it; but in general I preferred indulging my fancy for keeping aloof from those who were little charmed with my company. A system of the most unblushing bribery had won for me a warm welcome from the savage tribes in the nursery. Many and many an evening found me walking down that hedged lane in the frosty dusk, with Teecie Ray limping by my side, and talking her grave simple little talk. I had always some fresh puzzle to propose to her, and she was always ready to knit her smooth brows over its solution. Once she stopped short, and struck her little crutches on the snow.

"You ought to go away from here and work," she cried. "O, if I could!"

A certain Sir Harry arrived at Rutland Hall: I will not trouble myself to think of his second wealthy bachelor of high family, and his movements were watched with interest by the ladies of the house. This Sir Harry had a fancy for smoking his cigar in the hedged lane, and on his back-road into London he encountered my little benefactress limping on her solitary way, and stared at the pretty fresh face under her old black hat, till it blushed with uncomfortable radiance. Teecie changed her track like a hunted hare, but Sir Harry scented her out, and annoyed her with his unwelcome attentions. The matter reached Mrs. Rutland's ears, and she vented her chagrin on the defenseless little girl. I know not what unmerciful scolding and reproaches she bestowed upon her during a long private lecture; but, that evening when, at the children's tea-hour, I entered the nursery with a new ball in my hand for Jack (the youngest and least objectionable of the band), I saw Teecie Ray's face governed by the fear of Death. It was flushed and swollen with passionate crying. I do not intend to commit to paper certain remarks which I made on the spot upholding this disfigurement.

"Come, come, Teecie," I said, while nurse was busy making a disturbance which was aimless because "Cousin Guy" had not brought something to every one else as well as Jack: something to every one else as well as Jack, "where is all your philosophy, little mother? You need never preach to me again, if you set me such a bad example."

Teecie gave me a word, but stared on into the fire. This wound had cut deep. Sir Harry, and Mrs. Rutland, and Mrs. Rutland's daughters about I should have dearly loved to knock your two good-for-nothing heads together!

"Teecie, I've got a secret to confide to my friend, at any rate, even if he be not a very grand one."

She gave one of her quaint expressive little looks. Though, indeed, I meant nothing all that, but I can not talk just now." By-and-by, however, she brightened up, and went to the table to share in the tea and bread-and-butter, and I began to mend a bow belonging to Tom. Tom was one of the leaders of the unruly tribes, a regular little savage.

Ere two days more had passed I felt strongly inclined to exercise the horsewhip on this young gentleman's shoulders. On the second morning I was seized with an impish inspiration to play a trick upon Teecie. Stealing her crutches, he walked down the garden-path with them, one little limp, and then marching off with them, heedless of her entreaties to have them restored, carried them triumphantly to the stable, and smashed them in pieces with a hatchet. Teecie sat helpless in the din and riot of that ill-conditioned nursery. I found her there on returning and found her a prisoner, looking with longing eyes through the window-panes, out over the beautiful country that lay in the winter sunshine with the most audacious indifference. But why talk about Tom? I could not help believing, nor do I ever intend to believe, that Tom's hands than Tom's plotted the cruel caging of that bonnie bird.

The bird drooped on its perch; but who cared? Nurse vowed it was a shame, and showed more kindness than usual to the orphan, but I will not, therefore, decide how much of this tenderness was owing to the old crown-pieces which found their way from my hand to hers—all, perhaps, the guinea, of course? Oyes, all out of the guinea. And there was another friend who sometimes expressed a concern for Teecie Ray's affliction. This was that Lady Thornton, whose bounty had indirectly furnished me with pocket-money for my visit to the Rutland Hall. In favor of this old lady I had done my best to win. She was a nice comfortable lady, and I liked her for her kindness that she called one day during Teecie Ray's imprisonment, to invite the Rutlands and their visitors, great and small together, to a party to be given at her house, a few miles distant. I chanced to be alone in the drawing-room when she arrived, and I seized the opportunity to tell her the story of Teecie's crutches.

"A bad boy!" she said. "A bad, malicious boy! She must get new crutches before my party."

"Of course she must," I said, very heartily. "And could you have them back from Paris, raising the fat chin in a peculiar sort of way, and looking at me direct through her spectacles.

"Indeed you may," I said, very heartily, "that particular interest do you take in Teecie Ray!"

I smiled. "Oh, Teecie and I are excellent friends," I said.

"Teecie and you!" she repeated. "Pray, are you aware that Miss Ray is eighteen years of age?"

"Is she, indeed? I know nothing about the ages of little girls."

"But Teecie is not a little girl, Mr. Guy Rutland. Teecie Ray is a woman, I tell you!"

Teecie Ray a woman! I could not help laughing. What, my little benefactress, my little mother! I am afraid I scandalized Lady Thornton by that occasion by my utter scorn of her proposition. Christina Rutland swept into the room at this crisis, and relieved me in my difficulty. But often afterward during that day I laughed when I thought of Lady Thornton's piece of information. Teecie Ray a woman? Preposterous!

One morning, when it wanted but a week of the party, a curious event occurred. The heads of the house met in consultation on the matter, in the library, before breakfast. An extraordinary Thing had arrived from London at Rutland Hall. The Thing was a large wooden case, directed to Teecie Ray. On being eagerly opened, it was found to contain a pair of crutches.

And such a pair of crutches! Light and symmetrical, and fanciful, works of art in their way. Exquisite workmanship, capped with dainty little cushions of crimson velvet. Thunderstricken were the elders of the house. "Who could have done this thing?" was on every lip. Who, indeed? Who outside of Rutland Hall had ever heard of Teecie Ray? These crutches were costly affairs. I knew the conclusion they came to, one and all. They pitched on Sir Harry as the culprit. It was a thorn in their side, and I rubbed my hands in glee.

Having wondered at the question in their dismay, they decided that Teecie should be kept in ignorance of her mysterious present. It was best fit for her peace of mind that all her mind with absurd ideas. And so, in spite of the arrival of the beautiful crutches, poor Teecie still sat helpless in the nursery. The wooden case and its contents were hidden away, and no word was spoken of their existence.

I waited a few days to see if the elders would relent, but to no purpose. The bird still pined in its cage. Then I resolved upon a bold daring to open the cage door and let it fly. There sat Teecie, day after day, in her nursery chair, hemming spotted handkerchiefs, darning the children's stockings, looking longingly out of the window, and growing pale for want of fresh air. Still nobody thought of releasing her. Meanwhile the stir of Christmas preparation was agitating all the household, and the children were full of rapture at the thought of Lady Thornton's Christmas party. There was great excitement in the nursery about pretty new dresses, wonderful head-dresses of flowers and muslins, and fripperies. Teecie alone sat silent in her shabby frock. By-and-by, her hands were full, bowing up sashes, and ribbons, and bodices, stitching rosettes on shoes. She was a nimble little workwoman, and they kept her busy. Seeing how well a little girl could work, I suppose her, I thought it a pity she should not have a gay dress as well as the rest.

I said, "Teecie, what will you wear?" nor even, "Teecie, are not you invited too?" No one seemed to expect for a moment that Teecie could be left at home. She must be there. How could she go, she who was lame and had no crutches?

It happened that I had an errand to the nearest town. It was rather late when, on my return, I called at the best millinery establishment in the place, and bought a pair of gloves.

Yes, the parcel was ready. A large flat box. "Would the gentleman like to see the lady's pretty dress?" The box was opened, and a cloud of some airy fabric shaken out under my eyes. It was white, gossamer, descrite is, but it was something white, very pure and transparent, with something else of pink just blushing through it. It was exquisite tasteful, I pronounced, trying to look wise. There was only one fault: "Did it not seem rather long for a little girl?" I asked, measuring with the figure it was to adorn, with its short skirt just coming to the top of the boots, so well worn and mended.

"Oh, no, sir," the milliner, with dignity, "you said the young lady was eighteen years of age, and of course we have given her a flowing skirt."

It was late in the evening when I reached home. Two merry carriage-falls were just departing, and others, as I drove up. A few minutes afterward I was in the nursery with the milliner's parcel in my hands. There sat Miss Teecie Ray, contemplating her finished check on her hand, and contemplating the liter of scraps of ribbon, fragments of lace, scissors, sleeves, and other litter, among which lay scattered around her. She had had a toilsome, tiresome day, and now they had got all they wanted of her, and had left her to her solitude.

A flash of pleasure sprang to her face when she saw me. "Oh! I thought you had gone with the rest," she said, sorry to be "No," said I, "I have not gone yet, but I am going presently. I came for you."

"For me?" she echoed in dismay. "You know I could not go. I have no dress, even if I could walk."

"A dress has sent you a dress," I said, "and I will undertake to provide the crutches. Nurse, will you please to take this box, and get Miss Teecie ready for the party as quickly as possible? The carriage is waiting for us at the door."

Teecie flushed very red at first, and I thought she was going to refuse me. Nurse, and then she turned pale, and looked frightened. Nurse, to whom I had slipped a munificent Christmas box, immediately fell into raptures over the pretty dress.

"Come, Teecie," I said, "make haste!" And, trembling and between dread and delight, Teecie suffered herself to be carried off to her toilet.

By the time I returned from an exploring expedition, with the wonderful silver-and-tortoise-shell crutches under my arm, Teecie was ready.

Teecie was ready. Nurse, three simple little words mean so much that I feel I must stop and try to translate them into all they are bound to convey. They do not mean that Teecie, the child whom I was wont to call my little benefactress, my little mother, had got on a nice dress and was equipped for a juvenile party like other children. But they mean that there, when I came back, stood a beautiful girl in the prettiest of dresses, her swaying blush-colored robe. When she turned her head, I saw that the sweet face framed in its childlike hair was the face of the old Teecie Ray who was gone, and here was (pecora Lady Thornton!) a lovely woman.

We were all three ludicrously amazed at the sudden metamorphose that had taken place. Teecie was too simple not to show that she felt the change in herself, felt it keenly, with a strange delight and a strange shyness. Nurse had so long been accustomed to use her as a child that she stood bewildered. As for me, I enchanted, then foolishly awkward, and almost as shy as Teecie herself.

When I presented the crutches, nurse looked at me as though I must be some prince in disguise, out of the Arabian Nights. It was with a curious feeling that I saw Teecie try them, not limping now, rather gliding over the nursery floor, with the little velvet cushions hidden away amidst clouds of lace and muslin under her round white shoulders, and the airy masses of the fresh pink dress that I had bought for her by the gleaming silver staves. I don't know why it was that I thought at that moment, with a certain rapture, of a guinea as a little human box, that lay below in the one shabby portmanteau which I had thought proper to bring with me to Rutland Hall!

Our equipage awaited us. It was too late now for Teecie to run from what I had undertaken. Teecie and I were soon dashing over the snowy roads to Lady Thornton's. I will not attempt to describe the remainder of that memorable evening, or the sensation caused by our arrival; the wonder and mortification of my kind relations, or the neglected pleasure and displeasure of the hostess, who, while delighted to see her little favorite, took occasion to whisper angrily in my ear, "And pray, Sir, how is all this to end?"

The scene was all new and delightful to Teecie, but her dread of Mrs. Rutland's portentous frown would not let her enjoy it. We both felt that a storm would burst over our heads that night, and we were not wrong. None of the family from Rutland Hall took the least notice of us. When the time came for going home, they went off in their own carriages, and Teecie and I drove home as we had come. When we arrived, we found Cousin George and his wife waiting for us in the library, armed to the teeth. I saw it was to be war and no quarter. Mrs. Rutland could not trust into her chuckles, and carried them off, and I was left with George. I need not repeat all that passed between us.

"Sir," he said, "we have suffered your insolent intrusion long enough. You leave this house to-morrow morning."

"Cousin George," I said, "don't put yourself in a passion. I will go to-morrow morning, but upon one condition. That Teecie Ray may come with us, if she will."

He looked at me perfectly aghast. "Do you know," he said, "that she is a penniless friendless orphan, whom I have sheltered through charity?"

"I want to make her my wife," I said, sternly, "if, indeed, I be so fortunate as to have won her affections."

"And under that," he said, with a sneer, "how do you propose to live? Upon air, or your friends?"

"Not upon you, George Rutland," I said, looking him steadily in the eyes. "Mark me. I have tried you out. I have sifted you, all in this house, and I know you. You will find you all chaff, but the one golden grain which lies on my palm. I will keep it and treasure it, I say. And great I may!"

"Very fine," said George, "very fine. Remember, however, that from this moment I wash my hands of you both: you, Guy Rutland, and her, Teecie Ray."

"Amen!" I said, and bade him good-night, and turned on my heel and left him.

Early next morning I knocked at the nursery door, and begged of nurse to awake Miss Teecie, and ask her to speak with me in the garden, then went out to wait for her. It was Christmas morning, the dayest peace and good-will. When Teecie came to me, peace, as I looked over the calm landscape. And yet I bore no ill-will to any man or woman.

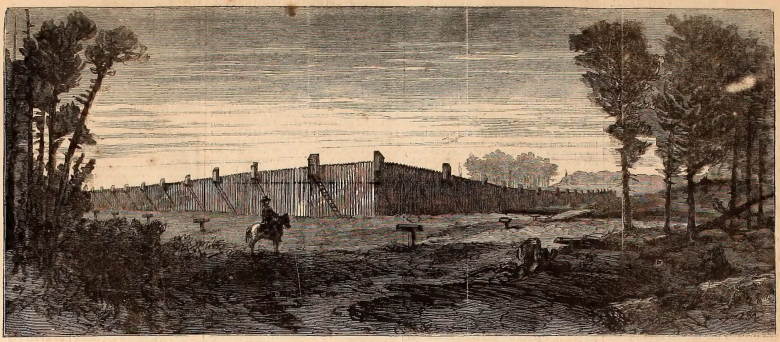
Teecie came to me by-and-by; just the same old Teecie, limping over the frosty path in her short shabby frock, and looking very frightened of her great crutches. I felt relieved when I saw her so. I was shy of the dainty lady whom I had called into existence the night before. And yet when I looked more closely, I knew that this was not quite the old Teecie, and that the very same Teecie of a day and a night ago, could not come back. Something was altered. Whether the change was in her or me, or in both of us, I did not inquire. The change was not an unpleasant one.

We strolled out of the garden, and into the park, and we talked earnestly all the way. On our way back I said:

"And you're not afraid of starving with me, Teecie? You will take the risk?"

One of her old nods was Teecie's answer.

"Go and fetch your hat, then," said I, "and we won't even wait for breakfast. Don't bring any thing else with you, not a shred. I have still some half-pence left—out of the guinea, you know—and we can get all we want."



Teecie fetched her hat and returned, and we set off together. An hour afterward a man met us on the road, and we all went away side in the church, and then we walked back to Rutland Hall, to say good-by to our kindred. Teecie's aunt and cousins saw me mad, and her a little fool;—at least until Cousin George received the cheque, which I sent them next day, to cover the expenses incurred by him through his charity to Teecie Ray. Then they began to wonder, and to waver. It took my cousin aback, and showed her the world. Time and care cured her of her lameness. It was not surprising that a few years after I had married her kinsfolk should scarcely recognize her—Teecie Rutland, née Ray—walking without crutches, and the wife of a millionaire! Half a guinea-cake conciliated Lady Thornton, and the wonderful guinea is still in my possession. I call it Teecie's dower. The crutches, the donor of which I beg to assure you, major, was not Sir Harry, are also

A FAREWELL TO THE OLD YEAR.

COME, gather round the glowing hearth
While swift the moments fly,
The hour which gives the New Year birth
On Time's swift wing draws nigh;
So gather here, with song and cheer
We bid the dear, the gray Old Year,
Our friend so long, good-by.

He leaves us soon, he may not stay,
Ere dawn he needs must go;
He hath been with us on the way
For many months, I know.
When skies were clear, when storms were near,
Through light and fear, the brave Old Year,
In rain and wind and snow.

He brought such gently dropping showers
To glad the silent plain,
Such precious gifts of fruits and flowers,
Such harvest fields of grain:
The gay Old Year, grown sad and drear,
We hold him dear who leaves us here
Ne'er to return again.

His form is bent, his face is white,
He hath seen many a day,
Soon will he pass into the night
To go upon his way.
The fond Old Year we hold so dear,
For him what cheer who lingers here
Where he is wont to stay?

What though he touched some hearts with grief
If others he made strong?
Bid him forget, he might grown brief,
He must be gone ere long,
The hale Old Year now blanched and sere,
Whose hour draws near; forgive him here
Whatever is of wrong.

Hark! heavy across the frozen snow
The belfry's pealing bell,
O sacton, toll well and slow,
It is his funeral knell;
Good-by, Old Year, to memory dear,
God rest his soul with many a tear
We give thee our farewell.

DINING—CORPULENCY—LEANNESS.

No. II.—On Corpulency and Leanness.

AT our last meeting, kind readers, we "dined it and wined it." During the interval good Mrs. Curnall has put to the following question: "Can you tell, doctor, do good fat people whom you ask to dinner in other ways besides the mere filling of their stomachs?" "Certainly, Madam, certainly," we replied. "A our next repast we intend to give some sound advice to our friends the Greatexes and the Lankys, and that, too, without fee."

"I say," somebody exclaimed our venerable friend Greatex—corpulency, Lanky (or did you say Yankee?)—leanness. Generous man! I shall certainly be very much profited by your exuberance and profound learning." "Thank you, Madam." Our guests will therefore not take it unkindly if we say a few words before meat." And first, we will address ourselves to the Greatexes.

By obesity we mean that state of fatty congestion when, without the individual being ill, the limbs or members increase gradually in size and lose their primitive form and beauty. There is one sort of obesity which is confined to the stomach. This is seldom found in women. "I myself," says Savarin, "am a sufferer in this respect, yet I have an ankle, instep, and calf as fine as an Arabian horse." Nevertheless, I looked upon my stomach as a most formidable enemy: I conquered it, and reduced it to its proper dimensions." The principal causes of corpulency may be easily stated. The first is the natural conformation of the individual. Every man is born with certain predispositions, which may be traced in his physiognomy. Out of one hundred persons who die of consumption ninety have brown hair, an oval face, and sharp nose. Out of one hundred "corpulents" ninety have a round face, globular eyes, and pug nose. It is therefore beyond a doubt that corpulence are predestined to be fat, and that, taking all things equally, their digestive powers produce a greater portion of fat. And here let us cite a few instances of men of weight. M. Laurent notices a Parisian boy who must have frightened his mother a little, for he weighed a hundred and four pounds at four years old. There was a boy at Wiltaton, in Durham, about a century ago, who, at the age of seven, measured three inches round the thigh, and thirty-three round the waist; he was a queer fellow in other ways, for he had six fingers on each foot, and six fingers on one hand. In 1784 died an Irish gentleman, Mr. Lovelace Love, from very fatness. So immense was his bulk that his coffin measured seven feet in length, four in breadth, and three and a half in depth. Mr. Baker, who died at Worcester in 1766, was so large a subject for the lungeons of the local gaol that his coffin measured seven feet over, and was bigger than an ordinary hearse, and part of which was obliged to be taken down to admit its passage." Six years afterward there died at Usk, in Monmouthshire, one Mr. Philip Mason, whose dimensions were recorded as follows: round the wrist, eleven inches; round the upper arm, twenty-one inches; round the chest, sixty inches; round the largest part of the body, seventy-two inches; round the thigh, thirty-seven inches; round the calf of the leg, twenty-five inches. The above instances are wanting in facilities for comparison, on account of the actual weights being, in most cases, unrecorded. We give the following as instances more specifically definite on this point. There was a Kentish farmer and inn-keeper, one Mr. Palmer, who attracted much attention in the early part of the present century by his enormous bulk. He weighed three hundred and fifty pounds. Five ordinary men could be buttoned at one time within his waistcoat. He came to London to see the famous Daniel Lambert, who was vastly the superior to Palmer in bulk, but the latter puffed so much through his fatness that Lambert pitied him, as a man to whom life must have been a burden. Palmer went home much mortified; his claim to notoriety was suddenly eclipsed by a rival, and his vexation hastened his death. A part of his inn had to be taken down to allow room for his coffin to be removed. John Love was so thin and meagre that a physician advised him to eat like a hearty. His advice was well taken. John Love became a gormandizer; his fatness killed him at the age of forty, when he weighed three hundred and sixty-four pounds. Mr. Benjamin Bower, a native of Holt, in Dorsetshire, attained a weight of four hundred and seventy pounds. In 1774 there died in Lincolnshire one Mr. Pell, who weighed five hundred and sixty pounds. He was inclosed in three coffins, the united weight of which, with himself, exceeded three thousand pounds. Mr. Bright, of Essex, was a person of great notoriety in the early days of the reign of George the Third. He died at the age of forty. His weight was six hundred and sixteen pounds. Seven men were, on one particular occasion, buttoned within his waistcoat. When his career was ended, and his body was incased in its monster coffin, not only walls, but staircases, had to be cut through before it could be got out; twelve men drew the low carriage on which the coffin was placed; and "an engine was fixed up on the church," as the local chronicler says, to lower the coffin into the grave. There was an Irishman, Roger Byrne, who died in 1804, whose bulk was so great that his attendants caused the him the mortification of having several stones heavier than the celebrated Mr. Bright of Essex." It required thirty men to carry to the grave which his body was laid. Mr. Spooner, a Tamworth man, who was living in 1775, attained a weight of six hundred and eighty pounds. He had been very heavy to walk, his legs being unable to bear him. He measured four feet three inches across the shoulders. It is recorded of him that "his fatness came on all his life; for, being at Atherstone market, and some difference arising between him and a Jew, the Jew stabbed him in the belly with a pen-knife; but the blade, being short, did not pierce his bowels, or even pass through the fat which defended them." But of men of weight Daniel Lambert stands at the king. Shortly before his death he attained the unprecedented weight of seven hundred and thirty-nine pounds. His coffin was seventy-six inches long by fifty-two wide, and contained a hundred and twelve square feet of elm. The coffin was regularly built upon sides and ends; and not only was the window but also the side of a room, had to be taken down to afford a passage for the bulky mass. The wheeled coffin was drawn by six horses, on which the pointed when the last hope of it failed? He read the doubt and perplexity at once.

"Let me explain," he said. "Your brother was looking expectantly for a draft from the North when I went away from here. I wrote to him, if it failed, that I knew of a person who would be glad to take good Northern securities for a small sum of money like this. It did fail, and he accepted the offer."

"And the securities, Mr. Hamilton?"

A mortgage of Manhattan Bank stock deeded the amount.

"I will not inquire who was generous enough to make such an offer in times like these. No, I need not be told. Accept my warmest thanks for removing the last burden from your brother's mind; but do not be offended if I can not allow you to run the risk, when every transaction between the North and the South is so uncertain. Take the check and destroy the mortgage. Colonel Hamilton, Had Robert lived it would have been different."

He was hurt. I saw it—felt it, and the feeling gave me real pain. To have acted differently would have been like receiving charity from the man I had rejected. A disagreeable silence ensued, which I was forced to break.

"Don't think me ungrateful, Colonel Hamilton. I could not bear that you, or to lose your friendship; but I must feel independent. I think there is another way in which you might assist me. You may hear of some person, now afraid of Northern sentiment, wishing a governess. Not quite yet—let me get accustomed to my loss and lighter grief."

"Trust me to do any thing a friend can do, dear Miss Margy. I would gladly have sheltered you in my home; since that can not be, I will, if necessary, give my life to protect you. Farewell!"

"Noble heart!" I exclaimed, as his last words lingered in my ears. "My antagonist is now my only friend!"

Three weeks are ages to the wretched. They were ages of struggle and overpowering anguish to me. Then I had a letter from Colonel Hamilton, kind but not demonstrative, in which he alluded to the situation I had proposed. Would I take charge of the motherless little girls, whose father was going to the army? The locality was healthy, quiet, and safe, but extremely isolated. My comfort would be studied by the servants—my wishes law to them. I could assume the charge whenever it pleased me.

Two lonely little girls and a quiet home! It sounded pleasant. I would accept the situation, and be ready in a week. So I wrote, and received directions reply.

A week of tearful preparation. Trunks to be packed alone; Robert's garments to be folded away carefully—I could not force myself to give to Uncle Joe or Jimmy—and daily visits to be made to the cemetery, at every one of which I knelt at my brother's grave, and promised him to come and lie down by his side or take him home. Aunt Milly relied me a shawl or foot-path thither, and usually accompanied me on my evening visits.

The last day I went in the morning, and alone. Every thing was in readiness for the sad, solitary journey; trunks strapped, carpet-bag filled with necessaries for the night, and my sleeping-dress assumed—the very same Aunt Hannah's hands had fallen upon the day we left home. Could it have been ten days, in my utter desolation, how would her tender heart have swelled with grief!

Mrs. Thomson, kind to the last, came with the carriage to take me home, avowedly, for an early dinner, that I might take rest before stage-time; but privately I knew that certain, to interrupt the painful farewell.

It was late in the afternoon when the stage-horn was heard under the Florida House. My trunks were on the piazza, so was the entire family. I was ready, and entered the stage amidst a shower of kisses and kind wishes—too much overcome to reply to any.

"Any more passengers, Jerry?" the Major inquired.

"None nearer than Hernando, Sir."

"I'm afraid you'll have a lonely ride to-night, Miss Milly. Be careful, Jerry."

I did not appreciate the Major's caution until we were beyond the Hillsboro, in the rugged road that leads to the ancient forest. Jagged palmetto roots buried in the sand, fallen trees to be avoided, creeks and rivers to be forded, are a few of the discomforts and dangers that throng the traveler's way across the peninsula. It has its compensations of beauty and wild magnificence.

Night came on in the lonely forest. The deep, surging tones of the pines seemed like the echo of the sorrowful sigh of my own heart. The grand old trees, with their solemn drapery of moss, swaying forever to and fro—to and fro—as if keeping time to their own dirge-notes, stood tall and spectral, like the ghosts of Oceola and his Seminole warriors. These were their paths. Scarcely was their war-cry silent yet among the Withlacoochee—their beloved river. It seemed very strange to me who had never made the shortest journey without father or brother to be traveling alone amidst such profound solitudes; yet I had not a thought of fear.

It was past midnight when the driver took down his horn and blew a shrill, vigorous blast. I strained my eyes, but no light was visible.

"Are we approaching a settlement?" I ventured to inquire.

"That's a one-hoss town yer; postmaster allus asleep. Gabriel 'll find him a tough one when he comes to blow."

The vehicle drew up before a low log building, labeled "Post-office," as seen by the dim light of the driver's lantern. It took another blast to arouse the dormant official.

"I say, Jim Henderson, that you've forgot that yer Uncle Sam's dead, and you've got a Governor now—but wears a spur. Hurry up yer cokes! Here's the bag."

"Won't do for you to say nothing to-night, ole boy! Yer mighty slow yerself! Twelve o'clock afore I fell asleep, I'll swear. Thought yer'd changed schedule."

"It wasn't my fault though. I was charged at both ends of the way to drive keerful, and I's gwine to do it and didn't bring in till next week."

"Crockery, boy?"

"Hold yer tongue, Jim! I'll take a drop of whisky when the mails sorted."

I could hear them talking in tones meant to be suppressed, as they made their way into the office.

"I say, Jerry, who is it yer bound to be so mighty keerful on?" Jeff Davis's wife?"

"A live Yankee."

"The devil it is!" You don't expect to smuggle her through ole Sumter County?"

"I'll like to see anybody else—that's all! She's none o yer dirt-eating sort, I tell ye; but talks right smart peart about the North as though 'twas all the New Jerusalem strung bawed with gold. That's the name they give her down in Hillsboro; but she don't say much now. She's powerful down-hearted since the young man died."

Then followed the story of my brother's death, told in rude language, but with a genuine pathos, ending with a few words of praise for the handsome passenger sass on Jerry Dining's beat.

"Stand to it, ole hoss! Jim Henderson's yer'll be to open the door. Gals like me—that's what's the use o'

REVIEW OF KILPATRICK'S CAVALRY DIVISION BY GENERAL SHERMAN, AT MARIETTA, GEORGIA, NOVEMBER 13, 1864.

THE CAPTURE OF SAVANNAH.

WE give on the next page two illustrations of General SHERMAN'S Army in front of Savannah. One of these represents General SHERMAN and his Staff, and is reproduced from a photograph by Mr. GEORGE W. BLENNARD, to whom we are indebted for the graphic sketches of the Prison-pen at Millen, published on page 13. The other sketch illustrates the capture of the rebel steamer Rosalie, on the Savannah River.

For the benefit of our readers we give the following list of the officers comprising the group in the sketch of General SHERMAN and Staff, which will be recognized by the corresponding numbers subjoined to the sketch:

1. Captain L. M. DAYTON, Aid-de-camp, Acting Adjutant-General.
2. Lieutenant-Colonel E. D. KITTOE, Medical Inspector.
3. Colonel AMOS BECKWITH, Aid-de-camp and Chief of Commissary.
4. Captain O. M. POE, Chief Engineer.
5. Brigadier-General W. F. BARRY, Chief of Artillery.
6. Major J. C. MCCOY, Senior Aid-de-camp.
7. Captain T. G. BAYLOR, Chief of Ordnance.
8. Major-General SHERMAN, Commanding.
9. Captain G. W. NICHOLS, Aid-de-camp.
10. Lieutenant-Colonel CHARLES EWING, Assistant Inspector-General.
11. Lieutenant-Colonel W. WARNER, Acting Inspector-General.
12. Captain J. E. MARSHALL, Assisting Adjutant-General to General BARRY.

General SHERMAN reached a position in front of Savannah on the 10th of December. General HARDEE was at that time conducting the defense of the city, having under his command a force which SHERMAN estimated at 15,000 men. It was General SHERMAN'S intention to invest Savannah so completely with his army as to prevent the escape of HARDEE'S army. The first thing to be done, of course, was to open communication with Admiral DAHLGREN. Fort M'Allister, on the Ogeechee River, stood in the way. This was a strong earth-work, situated about sixteen miles south of Savannah, behind Point Genesis, and commands the river. It was captured December 13 by General HAZEN'S Division of the Fifteenth Corps. SHERMAN then located his right on the Ogeechee at King's Bridge, while his left rested on the Savannah three miles above the city. Two boats were captured on the Savannah River, and a blockade established preventing the descent of the rebel gun-boats. There was a break in the investment of Savannah on the eastern side from the mouth of the river to a short distance above the city. It was by this outlet that HARDEE escaped with his army by crossing the river to Union Causeway. Before evacuating the city the rebels had blown up their iron-clads and burned the Navy Yard. General SHERMAN immediately entered the city. His captures include, according to General FORTER'S dispatch, eight hundred prisoners, one hundred and fifty guns, thirteen locomotives, one hundred and ninety cars, a large amount of ammunition and other material of war, besides three steamers and thirty-three thousand bales of cotton safely stored in warehouses.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

$5 FIRST PREMIUM SEWING MACHINE. $5

A BEAUTIFUL PRESENT FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

Just out. The FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE, a most wonderful and elegantly constructed NOVELTY; is perfectly noiseless in operation; uses the straight needle; sews with DOUBLE OR SINGLE THREAD; makes the running stitch more perfect and regular than by hand; will gather, hem, ruffle, shirr, tuck, run up breadths, &c., &c. Requires no instruction or change of stitch; is not liable to get out of order, and will LAST A LIFETIME, and is the prettiest and most useful CHRISTMAS or NEW YEAR'S GIFT for a lady. See Opinions of the Press. "At length the desideratum so long sought for, combining exclusiveness, speed, and elegance, has been gained. The simple structure of this remarkable and beautiful machine will at once command attention, and the speed, certainly, and ease with which the work is done will make it the favorite with the ladies."—Mrs. Ann S. Stephens, in N. Y. Weekly. "For the procurement of it is comfortable, for the household it supplies a vacant place."—Godey Lady's Book. "It was a common needle, sewed very rapidly, and to our unpracticed eye it was difficult to tell which was the stitch."—N. Y. Independent. "The many and useful machine is perfect in its construction, and has none of the faults of the high-priced machines. None will pay $100 or $150 for a sewing machine, when this one can be bought for $5. This wonderful machine was awarded the First Premium by the New York State Fair, showing its superiority over all others. Imitations or base compounds of this GENUINE ARTICLE are liable to prosecution. Agents of perseverance are wanted all over the world, and will be paid $100 per month.

Single machines, well packed in boxes, will be sent to any address, per express, on receipt of $5. All orders to orders FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE CO., 102 Nassau Street, New York.

A Single Box or
Brandreth's Pills

Contains more vegetable extractive matter than twenty boxes of any pills in the world besides; fifty-five hundred physicians use them in their practice to the exclusion of other purgatives. The first letter of their value is yet scarcely appreciated. When they are better known sudden death and continued sickness will be of the past. Let those who have been spared rejoice that in their favor. It is a duty which will save life.

Our race are subject to a redundancy of vitiated bile at this season, which is so dangerous as it is to promptness Brandreth's Pills afford an invaluable and efficient protection. By their occasional use we prevent the collection of those impurities which, when by sufficient quantities, cause so much danger to the body's health. They secure liver complaints, dyspepsia, loss of appetite, pain in the head, heart-burn, pain in the breast-bone, sudden faintness, and weariness.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box, enveloped in full directions. Purchase none unless my PRIVATE GOVERNMENT STAMP is on the box, signed upon it B. BRANDRETH in white letters.

"THE PEN IS MIGHTIER THAN THE SWORD."
THE GOLD PEN—THE BEST OF ALL PENS,
MORTON'S GOLD PENS,
THE BEST PENS IN THE WORLD.

On receipt of any of the following sums in Cash, the Subscriber will send by return mail, or otherwise, as directed, a Gold Pen or Pens—selecting the same according to description, viz.:

GOLD PENS WITHOUT CASES.

For 50 cents, the Magic Pen; for 75 cents, the Lucky Pen; for $1 00, the Reporting Pen; for $1 25, the Telegraph Pen; and for $1 50, the Excelsior Pen.—These Pens are not numbered, but correspond in size to Numbers 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 respectively.

THE SAME PENS IN SILVER-PLATED EXTENSION CASES WITH PENCILS.

For $1 00, the Magic Pen; for $1 25, the Lucky Pen; for $1 50, the Reporting Pen; for $1 75, the Telegraph Pen; and for $2 25, the Excelsior Pen.

These are Well-Finished Pens, with Iridosmin Gold Pens, with Iridosmin Points, the average wear of every one of which will far outlast a gross of the best Steel Pens; although they are unwarranted, and, therefore, not exchangeable.

THE NUMBERED, UNPOINTED PENS.

The name, "A. Morton," "Number," and "Quality," are stamped on the following Pens, and the points are warranted for six months, unless exchanged.

The Numbers indicate size only; No. 1 being the smallest, No. 8 the largest. No. 1 is suitable for No. 4 the smallest, and No. 10 the largest Mammoth Gold Pen for the desk.

Long and Medium Nibs of all sizes and qualities. Short Nibs of No. 4, No. 5, and No. 6 quality, of first quality.

The Long and Short Nibs are fine pointed; the Medium Nibs are fine and medium pointed. The engravings are fac-similes of the sizes and styles.

GOLD PENS WITHOUT CASES.

For $1 25 a No. 1 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 3 Pen, 2d quality.

For $1 50 a No. 2 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 3 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 4 Pen, 3d quality.

For $2 00 a No. 3 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 4 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 5 Pen, 3d quality.

For $2 50 a No. 4 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 5 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 6 Pen, 3d quality.

For $3 00 a No. 5 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 6 Pen, 2d quality.

For $4 00 a No. 6 Pen; $4 50 a No. 7 Pen; $5 75 a No. 8 Pen; $8 50 a No. 9 Pen; $7 50 a No. 10 Pen—all 1st quality.

THE SAME GOLD PENS, IN SILVER EXTENSION CASES, WITH PENCILS.

For $2 00 a No. 1 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 3 Pen, 2d quality.

For $2 50 a No. 2 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 3 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 4 Pen, 3d quality.

For $3 00 a No. 3 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 4 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 5 Pen, 3d quality.

For $3 75 a No. 4 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 5 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 6 Pen, 3d quality.

For $4 50 a No. 5 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 6 Pen, 2d quality.

For $5 75 a No. 6 Pen, 1st quality.

GOLD PENS, ALL FIRST QUALITY, IN SILVER-MOUNTED GUM HOLDERS.

For $2 75 a No. 4 Pen; for $3 25 a No. 5 Pen; for $4 00 a No. 6 Pen; for $5 75 a No. 7 Pen.

For $7 a No. 8 Pen; for $8 a No. 9 Pen; and for $9 a No. 10 Pen.

The "1st Quality" are pointed with the very best Iridosmin Points, carefully made and tested, and this quality are sold with the slightest imperfection which skill and the closest scrutiny can detect.

The "2d Quality" are superior to any Pens made by him previous to the year 1860.

The "3d Quality" he intends shall equal in respect to Durability, Flexibility, and Good Writing Qualities (the only true considerations) any Gold Pens made elsewhere.

In regard to the Cheap Gold Pens, he says that what previous to operating his New and Patented Machines, he could not make a Good Pen, he can now make a Good Pens, for the Price, had the Gold been furnished gratuitously.

Parties ordering most in all instances specify the "Name" or the "Number" and "Quality" of the Pen wanted, and the particular to describe the kind they prefer—whether stiff or limber, coarse or fine.

All remittances will be made in registered letters are at my risk, and to all who send twenty cents (charge for registering), in addition to the amount ordered, I will guarantee their safe delivery.

Parties making Gold or Gold Pens will be allowed the full premium on the duty received.

TO CLUBS.—A discount of 10 per cent. will be allowed on sums of $15, if 15 per cent. on $24, and of 20 per cent. on $40, if sent in one letter to one Address.

CONSTITUTION
LIFE SYRUP
COMPOSED OF
IODIDE POTASSIUM,
WITH THE COMPOUND CONCENTRATED FLUID
EXTRACT OF VALUABLE MEDICINAL ROOTS AND HERBS.
PREPARED BY
WILLIAM H. GREGG, M.D.,
Graduate of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York, formerly Assistant Physician in the Blackwell's Island Hospitals, late Medical Inspector of the New York State Volunteer Depots, under Governor Edwin D. Morgan.

Constitution Life Syrup
HAS PRODUCED A REVOLUTION IN MEDICINE
IN THIS CITY.

What may seem almost incredible is that many diseases hitherto considered hopelessly incurable are frequently cured in a few days or weeks. Its action is based on the investigations of the liberal-minded and scientific, to cure which have no parallel at this period.
By curing the past five years we have contended with obstacles, and encountered prejudices as formidable as were ever encountered by any reformers.

Some say, "Your cures are too quick," while others doubt their permanence, and think that diseases can only be cured by the slow, tedious process of Nature."
This is our reply: In health the body, like a well-balanced scale, is in a state of equilibrium. But when, from any cause, down goes one side of the scale, we have the effect of disease. What is requisite is to restore the normal balance of the scale.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP
Is a positive and specific remedy for all diseases originating from an IMPURE STATE OF THE BLOOD, and for all (hereditary) DISEASES TRANSMITTED from PARENT TO CHILD.

PARALYSIS.
It is so universally admitted that CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP is the only effective means of restoration in the various forms of Paralysis, that we need not reiterate that it is emphatically the life-giving Syrup for Paralysis.

DYSEPESIA.
INDIGESTION, WEIGHT AT STOMACH, FLATULENCE, LIVER COMPLAINT, WANT OF STRENGTH, SHORT BREATH, CONSTIPATION, BILIOUSNESS.

SCROFULA.
STRUMA, KING'S EVIL, GLANDULAR SWELLINGS, ERYSIPELAS, ULCERATION, SALT RHEUM.

This taint (HEREDITARY and ACQUIRED), filling life with untold misery, is, by the CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP, totally eradicated—enormous swellings are reduced. Cases, chronic or virulent, of many or thirty years' standing, have been cured by us.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP
Purges the system entirely from all the evil effects of MERCURY, removing the BLUE Breath, and curing the Weak Joints and Rheumatic Pains which the use of Calomel is sure to produce. It hardens Spongy Gums, and secures the Teeth as firmly as ever.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP
Eradicates, root and branch, all Eruptive Diseases of the Skin

ULCERS, PIMPLES, BLOTCHES,
And all other difficulties of this kind, which so much disfigure the outward appearance. It makes old females, often making them a disgusting object to themselves and their friends.

For all Forms of Ulcerative Diseases,
Either of the Nose, Throat, Tongue, Spine, Forehead, or Scalp, no remedy has ever proved its equal.

Notice further upon the Kidneys. Any impending upon a diseased action of the Liver, are very unpleasants to the Liver. Any disease or the least bottles of CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP will correct the secretion, and remove the debris, which is always present in such cases.

Disease of the Liver, giving rise to Languor, Dizziness, Indigestion, Weakness, Jaundice, Abscess and cancerous condition of that organ, accompanied with burning or other unpleasant symptoms, will be relieved by the use of Constitution Life Syrup.

As a General Blood-Purifying Agent, the LIFE SYRUP stands unrivaled by any preparation in the world.

THE RICH AND POOR
Are liable to the same diseases. Both classes have made the CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP for the benefit of

PURE BLOOD
Produces healthy men and women; and if the constitution is neglected, death, disease and misery will be the result. Do not delay when the means are so near at hand, and within the reach of all.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP
IS THE FOOD MAN'S FRIEND, AND THE RICH MAN'S PHYSICIAN.

Buy it, Take it, and be Cured.

"IS ALL DEM YANKEES DAT'S PASSING?"

One of the most amusing as well as most striking features of SHERMAN'S march through Georgia was the utter amazement of the people, black and white, of the hitherto unvisited regions through which the army passed. At the immense numbers of the "Yankees." Our Artist sends us a portrait from life of one of the "colored population," who watched, hour after hour, the endless column of Blue-Coats cheerily filing by the plantation, from which, probably, she was never ten miles in her life, and finally broke out: "Is all dem Yankees dat's passing?" Another exclaimed, to a daughter of her master, "Law! Miss HATTIE, jess look dar in de road! dem Yankees like so many blackbirds!"

TESTIMONIAL FROM THE MOST DISTINGUISHED ARTISTS To STEINWAY & SONS.
NEW YORK, December, 1864.
The PIANO FORTE, Grand, Square, and Upright, manufactured by Messrs. STEINWAY & SONS, have established for themselves a worldwide reputation that it is hardly possible for us to add any thing to their just fame. Having thoroughly tested and tried those instruments pronounced by far years, both in public and private, it becomes our pleasant duty to express our candid opinion regarding their unquestioned superiority over any other piano known to us.
Among the chief points of their uniform excellence are:—Greatest possible depth, richness, and volume of tone, combined with a pure brilliancy, clearness, and perfect evenness throughout the entire scale, and above all a surprising duration of sound, the pure and sympathetic quality of which never changes under the most delicate or powerful touch. The combinations of these qualities render the STEINWAY PIANO, and together with the matchless prompt elasticity, and singularly delicate action always characterizing these instruments, as well as their unequaled durability under the severest trials, is truly astonishing, and places at once the admiration of every artist. We, therefore, consider the "STEINWAY" PIANO in all respects far the best instruments made in this country or Europe, and unhesitatingly pronounce them, in quality of tone, touch, and repeatedly recommend them invariably to our friends and the public.
We have at different times expressed our opinion regarding the pianos of various makers, but freely and unhesitatingly pronounce Messrs. Steinway's Grand Pianos, both grand and square, incomparably superior to them all.

OIL TERRITORY,
67 Tracts, 7000 Acres,
IN THE STATE OF VIRGINIA AND OHIO.
THE VIRGINIA AND OHIO PETROLEUM MINING COMPANY was incorporated for mining and operating Petroleum Oil Lands, and for this purpose have secured some SIXTY-SEVEN tracts of valuable Oil Territory, comprising in all over SEVEN THOUSAND ACRES, situated on the various creeks and runs in Ohio and Virginia, flowing into the Ohio River within a radius of about thirty miles from Marietta, Ohio, and situated in the heart of the Oil Region, in the midst of a great number of producing wells.
The Petroleum from these lands is of a light color, high gravity, and very free from sediment, is much sought after by refiners, and readily commands nearly two cents per gallon more than that from Oil Creek.
The Company hold in FEE Thousand Shares of its capital stock, to be disposed of, as required, to raise sufficient means to develop its property. The remainder of these shares, if not wanted for this purpose, can be divided among its stockholders pro rata.
For the purpose of raising sufficient means to further develop their oil territory, they now offer a limited number of shares of their WORKING CAPITAL Stock, full paid, at the low price of FIVE DOLLARS each per share.
Applications for shares to be addressed to either of the officers of the Company, at their office, 51 BROAD ST., NEW YORK, where a prospectus and further information can be obtained.

SHERMAN

WHAT grander name than his on that fair scroll,
Where, writ in fadeless characters, shall stand
The names of those, the saviors of the land,
Recorded of bright Fame's immortal roll!

Scarce have our hearts ceased thrilling to the cry,
Which passed from lip to lip, "Atlanta's ours!"
Than come the news that on Savannah's tower
Our flag floats on the broad blue sky.

Ring out from every spot, ye jubilant bells!
Ring loud and long those merry Christmas times!
Let notes of victory mingle with your chimes,
Till all the pealing chorus swells!

Long shall the tale be told by gray-haired sires,
Of that great march through the rebel rugged ways,
For many miles and many weary days,
To thickening perils, winter evening fires.

Hail to the Chief who led the venturous ranks!
Long may he live to wear his well-won fame,
And his children children taught to lisp his name;
For him a people's praise, a nation's thanks.

And hail to those who bore the flag with him,
Through fearless ranks of true and manly hearts;
The old year lingers long as it departs
To sing their praises with the Christmas hymn.

Such men are fashioned after God's own heart;
Fearless in danger, counting their rich blood
Even as nothing to their country's good—
Of the world's history they form a part.

There is a deathless heritage; their deeds
Blossom, like flowers, upon the page of Time;
And Science toil in prose or glowing rhyme
Seem writ in shining gold to him who reads.

WILMINGTON.

WE are told in early youth that the shyest birds can be caught by putting a little fresh salt upon their tails. It is well that the progress of the war is so prosperous that we can laugh rather than cry over the Wilmington expedition. The end, indeed, has not appeared, but the beginning is complete. There is something ludicrously suggestive of Chinese warfare, of the loud beating of the tomtom to appall the enemy, in the idea of blowing up a ship on the open sea in front of a fort, and anticipating "paralysis" as the result. Universal falling of the walls, apoplexy, and demoralization, then a jubilant charge, and all was to be over.

We know it is easy to smile after the event. But this was, after all, a question of science. The laws and forces of concussion are computable: and it is an interesting inquiry to whom we are indebted for this suggestion, and whether it were gravely approved by a competent, scientific board. The only paralysis produced seems to have been upon the wrong side. For it really looks as if the explosion were regarded as the essential effort, and that failing, further exertion were to be held useless. Admiral Porter, indeed, remained; but he remained upon the open sea in a stormy season to bombard earth-works. Should he succeed in obtaining the fort the greater will be his glory.

Certainly we are very far from complaining that an assault was not made. We are none of us here competent to decide that it should have been. Neither do we say that the troops were not well handled. General WEITZEL is a most skilful and accomplished soldier, and General BUTLER is no fool. Admiral PORTER naturally thinks that, if one man could seize a flag and take a prisoner almost within the fort, a column of men could successfully assault it. But then Admiral PORTER thought the fort was seriously disabled, when a reconnoissance showed it was not. Commodore ROGERS also thinks that the fort was virtually at our mercy, and that the fact of eight hundred of our men remaining on the shore for several hours unattacked by rebels proves that they were entirely worsted. But it is fair to suppose that the rebels believed the remaining of our troops to be some kind of snare. They could not believe that so enormous movement against Wilmington was already at an end, and that our men were retiring.

But we are surely entitled to say that some one has blundered, and that the some one should be ascertained and properly dealt with. We write, indeed, at the close of the first act only. Should the second and the drama actually open the country will rejoice all the more because of the check. But the check should be explained. And if the fleet that sailed forth under such prodigious salvos of acclaim and confidence should return after a brilliant bombardment, and the discovery that tomtoms and stink-pots are not formidable weapons of war, we shall be entitled to the feeling that, while officers and men, and especially those who undertook the perilous task of the explosion, have done all that brave men could do, yet that in the direction of the united armament there was some fatal defect which might have produced vast and melancholy disaster instead of amusing failure.

THEN AND NOW.

IN April, 1861, the Savannah Republican said: "The people of the Monumental City were right in arresting the progress of an army raised to shoot down their Southern brethren. We hope they will keep up the good work, and even send at home for their honor and independence. There are slumbering fires not only in Maryland, but in States north of her, that await only an opportunity to burst forth, and when they appear we may look out for a revolution that the world now little expects. Thank God! the time has arrived when these minions of Abolition can never plant a foot south of the Potomac."

In December, 1864, the Savannah Republican says: "By the fortunes of war a few days past we (or the authority of the Federal military forces ..... We desire to counsel obedience and all proper respect on the part of our citizens, and to express the belief that the better feelings of our sons will be respected by our military rule. ..... Let our conduct be such as to win the admiration of a magnanimous foe, and give no ground for complaint, and we may expect on the part of him who will for an indefinite period hold possession of our city."

In April, 1861, it said: "We would as soon confederate with the cannibals of the South Sea or the Thugs of India as with them [the Yankees]. They have forced us to the separation, and now, we say, let it be forever, and even beyond that time, should God in his providence permit. We want nothing to do with such a people, either in time or eternity."

In December, 1864, it says: "The fear expressed by many that General SHERMAN will repeat the order of expulsion from our homes which he enforced against the citizens of Atlanta we think to be without foundation..... It behooves all to keep within their houses until General SHERMAN shall have organized a provost system, and such police as will insure safety in person as well as property."

So it will be to the end, and the deluded people of the seceded country gradually learn what wretched and criminal gascons the Southern leaders were who have plunged the country into war.

BOUNTIES.

A LARGE number of conspicuous and influential gentlemen in Philadelphia, who have been personally familiar for a long time with the working of the bounty system, have prepared a careful and very sensible memorial to Congress upon the subject of local bounties, which is heartily approved by Governor CURTIN, the tried and admirable Mayor of that city.

We were sorry to see that our friend and neighbor, the New York Times, speaks of these gentlemen as dictating to the rest of the community in what way recruits shall be supplied or substitutes furnished. But certainly a simple suggestion upon an important public question, considerately made by any body of our fellow-citizens, ought not to be denounced as dictation. The Times also declares that to abolish the substitute system is to return to the days of the French Directory. That may be true, but the Philadelphia gentlemen have made no such proposition.

On the day after the appearance of this rather contemptuous criticism, the Times published a letter from Mr. J. R. HAMILTON, one of its ablest correspondents, in which the abuses of the system which the Philadelphia gentlemen aim to correct are set forth in the most striking terms. If the Times thinks that Mr. HAMILTON is "rhetorical," what does it think of this extract from its correspondent's letter, which is undoubtedly the plainest truth?

"To make all the abuse now being perpetrated in the army, by the present application of the substitute and bounty system, will be to pen what many may deem incredible; but there is nothing herein asserted which will not be found capable of undeniable proof. Will it be believed that I will give the names of men who have, of course, by boards of enrollment, examining physicians, etc., evidence that they were guilty conscripts at home, have had the audacity to send as recruits to our army cripples from birth; men partially blind; idiots from town farms; people with the hands of their fellow-men full of feloneous or fifteen: men being constantly claimed as subjects of other Governments; graduates of the State Prison of New York; escaped prisoners from the Dry Tortugas; rebel adventurers from Canada and elsewhere; men who have suffered by years of paralysis, and hundreds who can not understand one word of the English language, and whom it is, of course, impossible for them to instruct in the duties of a soldier? Indeed, it is to be feared that a large portion of the deserters from the army, attracted by the large bounties offered, form no small part of the bounty-jumping element among us.

"But it is far safer to find fault than to suggest a remedy—which latter is no part of my province. All I know is that it is utterly impossible to continue a system which works worse than the present one, whether we regard the enormous drain upon the public Treasury, or the deleterious effect upon our armies; the injustice in fifties upon the real soldier who is battling devotedly for his country, or the cruel prospect which it holds out to him—always white portions of armies, which have been paid for at hard cash, but which are nowhere to be found when required.

"I have now laid before you a few of the leading features of the system which is now working such serious evil in our armies, from the highest to the lowest grade, but will corroborate all I have said. Let those see to the remedy to whom duty belongs, and let the people know the danger for the poison is circulating to an extent little dreamed of by those who have not watched it."

The Philadelphia memorial, after rehearsing the facts and showing the inevitable consequences of such a system of recruiting, makes four very simple, comprehensive, and judicious suggestions. First, that short terms of service should be avoided, and the President be authorized to draft for one, two, or three years at his discretion. Second, that the practice of local buying up of recruits from other places should be discouraged, and, as a means, that the Government bounty be restricted to those who receive no local bounty; that every substitute should be credited with its own residents, no matter where they credit themselves; and that the recruiting in insurrectionary districts should be abolished. Third, that the unexpired terms of deserting volunteers should be charged to the locality entered for them. And Fourth, that, as such measures would diminish volunteering, there should be a moderate bounty for the drafted men, or family provision during their absence. This memorial we are such names as HORACE BINNEY, JUN., MORTON M'MICHAEL, HENRY C. LEA, CHARLES GILPIN, J. I. CLARK HARE, D. E. WALLACE, GEORGE TROTT, and others; nor can we see that it is rhetorical or dictatorial.

Such a plan credits every substitute with those who are willing to go from it, and requires those who can not go either to find a substitute at home or among those who are not citizens. There can be no question that the operation of the present bounty system is perilous to the country. "You are contending with an enemy," said General MITCHELL, "who will fight you with a two-pound fork, if he can find no other weapon. Can you safely fight him with soldiers who care nothing for the cause, and are there only because they will dig a ditch?" Exemptions there must be, and substitutes; but because these must be there is no reason why they should be scoundrels and felons, and there is every reason why they should not be such.

The City Bounty Fund Commission in Philadelphia, which, within the year, has paid bounties to more than twenty thousand volunteers, cordially approves the memorial, being persuaded that some national action upon the subject is necessary, as the active competition embarrasses all local efforts. The object of the movement is neither altogether to abolish substitutes or bounties, but to make them both as effective, and not as useless and dangerous, as possible. If the Philadelphia plan be not the best way, its proposers ask that some better one may be adopted. Is such a spirit unreasonable, or such a plan unfair?

MR. ADAMS.

WHAT we said last week of Mr. DAYTON in Paris is equally true of Mr. ADAMS in London. He is an advanced outpost of America. He illustrates the national faith and the national character. Prudent, silent, self-respecting manliness, and almost dry and austere manner, are delightfully contrasted with the characteristics of the rebel emissary in England, whom the American knows as Fugitive-Slave-Law Bill MASON, and who flly represents his confederates and their lamentable cause. After the ballying and blustering and cutting aside of the question of slavery, which has characterized our ministers in Europe for so long a time, it is refreshing to hear an American embassador and gentleman speak plainly and honorably his own profound convictions, as well as that of the better part of his nation and the world, and say, as Mr. ADAMS did to the deputation that presented to him upon the result of the election: "All good men may have cause to rejoice in the termination of this melancholy struggle, if that end be to the confirmation of a free government in America, and the eradication of the most formidable evil with which its progress has been heretofore cursed."

Who will not say Amen, and who will not thank God that the representatives of the United States are at last unmuzzled?

But Mr. ADAMS has another remarkable also for the quiet dignity with which he stated the exact condition of public sentiment in England and the United States. He said to Sir CHARLES WYVILL, Dr. RUTHERFORD HODGES, and the other gentlemen of the deputation, that he could not disguise from them or from himself the painful fact that the feeling of bitterness in our struggle had often been manifested in England; "and that the knowledge of this has given rise to a general impression among my countrymen that there has been a disposition in many degrees the disruption and consequent downfall of the power of the United States. Hence has sprung up a corresponding degree of ill-will which bids fair, if not counteracted, only to increase with time. If such passions be permitted a full indulgence between two nations, it needs little sagacity to foretell that, in the long run, the end is war." He added that the demonstrations of friendship for the United States, which he is continually receiving from various parts of the kingdom, will enable the lovers of peace to say, that, "whatever may be the hostility of some, it is by no means shared by the greater number of the British people, and ought not to be presumed to be a national expression."

This confirmation by Mr. ADAMS of the opinion of Lord RUSSELL and of every sincere friend in every sphere should be remembered. There is a foolish feeling, carefully fostered in this country by those who imagine that hatred of England is a test of American patriotism—that we ought to have a war with England. But it would be a war in which neither nation could be gainers. It would be a contest against civilization. It would be one of the gravest disasters that could befall human society; and it is therefore the serious duty of every true American to distinguish between the venal and mean England, which, under the lead of American slave-drivers, disturbs a meeting at Bristol called to rejoice over the result of our election, and the England which congratulates Mr. ADAMS, and speaks by GOLDWIN SMITH, and cheers RICHARD COBDEN and JOHN BRIGHT.

THE "FLORIDA" CORRESPONDENCE.

THE correspondence between the Brazilian Minister in Washington and Mr. SEWARD upon the case of the Florida is just what it should be —simple, direct, and honorable.

The Brazilian Government, notified of the capture the Secretary of State wrote immediately to Mr. WEBB, at Rio Janeiro, to say to the Brazilian Government that, although we had not ceased to regret the concession of belligerence to rebels, yet we were disposed to examine the question in a friendly spirit, and to do justice. This was on the 11th of November. On the 12th of December the Brazilian Minister in Washington addressed a letter to Mr. SEWARD detailing the circumstances, and adding that he reposed perfect confidence in the friendly intentions of the United States, whose energetic defense of neutral rights is traditional, and which will undoubtedly make proper reparation to a friendly power for an offense of such "transcendent gravity."

Mr. SEWARD replied that Brazil justly expected the regret and disavowal of the President for an act inconsistent with the traditions and well-considered policy of the United States. Captain COLLINS will be suspended and summoned before a court-martial; and as the Consul admits that he incited the act, he will be dismissed. The flag of Brazil will receive the same reparation from the power of the United States. But this Government does not admit any charge of falsehood or treachery against the Captain and Consul, which they deny; and especially denies that the rebel insurgents are a lawful naval belligerent, and repeats emphatically that the concession to them of belligerent rights by Brazil is regretted and declared unfriendly to the United States, to which Brazil will owe reparation of the consequences of such concession. Yet it is not for one nation or consuls to choose, without authority, when, how, and where to redress the wrongs of this country; and although the crew of the Florida are enemies of their own Government and convicted, of the human race, they were unlawfully seized, and will therefore be set at liberty.

This is the manly good sense which preserves the peace of the world. Minister WEBB will see that he should rather have waited, and have forborne to make a difficulty with one independent and friendly Government on account of hurting another. Bluster and indignation do not help international peace. If other nations choose to sneer and rage and falsify, let us, taught by their ridiculous and humiliating example, only the more sedulously avoid the same dishonorable courses. Following our traditions when they are just and wise, loyally maintaining them when they are not, the moral power of the United States Government will be as commanding as it means to have its military and naval power irresistible.

THE GOVERNOR'S FIRST WORD.

THE first word from Governor FENTON is a clear and ringing note of hearty patriotism. Before his message was delivered, and before the sun set on the day of the inauguration, he issued an earnest call to the citizens of the great State to aid GRANT and SHERMAN, SHERIDAN and THOMAS, FARRAGUT and PORTER, in securing the fruits of the victories they have so bravely won. Let us be patient and persevere, says the Governor, "in the closing of the great struggle which is to end in the restoration of this Government upon a foundation firm as truth and righteousness."

It is a profound satisfaction for every loyal citizen of the United States to feel that the executive authority of the State of New York will no longer give a wavering and uncertain sympathy to the cause of the enemies of the State. Its object will not be to discover in what way, short of open resistance, it can most effectively balk and paralyze the best efforts of the nation to save its united existence. This has been the strenuous effort of the late Governor. In a vast war which imperiled the country he has been content to act as though the fate is a warning. Carefully educated for political life, and the expectant successor in State and national honors of VAN BUREN and MARCY, when he became Governor of New York two years ago he was the recognized leader of the Opposition, and his nomination for the Presidency was as much as any political event can be. It is but the truth to say that his ill-concealed hostility to the war and sincere political sympathy with the rebel cause have utterly and forever destroyed his chances of political promotion among a resolute and patriotic people.

His successor enters upon his great responsibilities full of the deepest sympathy with the cause for which the Union soldiers and sailors are fighting. For a long time President of the National Soldiers' Relief Commission, Governor FENTON is practically acquainted, also, with the perils and sufferings and wants of the army and navy. His sympathy and admiration are not of the mouth, but of the heart; and his call for a ready and cheerful response to the summons for more men is that of a man who feels what he says, and who is as sure of the patriotism of others as he is of his own.

PUBLIC GIFTS.

MANY years since some worthy citizens of Philadelphia gave Commodore DECATUR a massive silver wine-cooler in testimony of their admiration and respect. A few days ago some worthy citizens of New York presented Vice-Admiral FARRAGUT with fifty thousand dollars in Government bonds.

The massive silver wine-cooler, after some years, was exposed for sale in Philadelphia, and was finally bought by a distinguished citizen of Albany.

The difference in the character of the gifts does not show a difference of generosity, but of the times. Let us rejoice that the days of honorable silver tea-kettles and of grateful punchbowls to public benefactors have passed away, and those of solid, substantial rewards have dawned. It is impossible, indeed, to contemplate the DECATUR wine-cooler without remembering that it was intended merely as a symbol of honor and recognition which could not be estimated in money, and would even be injured by the attempt to represent it in that way. But such a sentiment, although honorable, was mistaken. For the Government stands it also merely a symbol. Nobody supposes that it represents the value of the Vice-Admiral's services, which are entirely incalculable. It is equally an honor with the vases and the kettles and the wine-coolers of an earlier day, but it is not, like them, an empty honor.

It has long been the practice in England to reward eminent public service in the army and navy by the most valuable honors. The palace of Blenheim is a monument of British gratitude, and of the other famous men who were honored and enriched by public gratitude NELSON and WELLINGTON are among the most conspicuous. But rewards are not confined to military or naval success in England. In the great universities there are fellowships which are prizes for superior scholarship. The fellowship entitles the holder to a home in the college and a certain stipend contingent upon his taking orders in the Church and remaining single. The literary fund is a public fund which authorizes even an annual pittance from the Government, is a poor recognition of the same principle, which is simply this, that those who truly benefit the nation are entitled to some degree of national support.

It will hardly be contested that it is a democratizing age. Or the sentiment is the conspicuous and unquestionable. The sense of power and the desire of fame are too intimately allied to be disturbed by any lower influence. MARLBOROUGH was not a respectable character, yet he was a great General, not because he hoped for Blenheim, but because he had genius and energy to use. Blenheim rewarded success. It could never have inspired it.

The New Year's gift to Vice-Admiral FARRAGUT, and the intended testimony to Captain WILKES and to General SHERMAN are graceful and generous signs of a public gratitude that will not forget its other noble servants, nor satisfy its gratitude with the presentation of silver pitchers and pretty swords.

LITERARY.

"The American Boy's Book of Sports and Games" (DICK & FITZGERALD) is the book of books for a boy's holiday gift. It is all that the "Boy's Own Book" was twenty years ago, with the natural improvements and enlargements of the subsequent time. Its six or seven hundred engravings—its accurate and copious descriptions of all kinds of outdoor and indoor games for every season—its instructions in parlor magic and in all manly exercises, with its convenient form, make it at once a cyclopedia and a manual. It is a unique and invaluable boy's companion.

"Poems by David Gray, with a Memoir of his Life" (ROBERTS & BROTHERS, Boston). Twenty years ago this winter a young Scotchman named DAVID GRAY, twenty-three years old, died at the house of his father, a handloom weaver, seven miles from Glasgow. He was early conscious of poetic power, and morbidly anxious for fame as a poet. He sent his efforts of poetry by burst away to London; appealed to the sympathy of MILNES and SIDNEY DOBELL, who truly befriended him; and he was very soon back again dying of consumption in his father's cottage. He gave himself to death and forgetfulness with a tender resignation, and lived only long enough to see the proof-sheets of some of his verses. He died, and they were published in England, and are reprinted in this pretty volume. They are not to be set aside as the feeble wailings of consumptive poverty; for although DAVID GRAY strikes no master chord, there is a touching poetical emotion in his verse which will keep his name with those of KIRKE WHITE and CHATTERTON.

"History of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States" (CARLTON & PORTER, New York). This able and careful work, the two first volumes of which are now offered to the public, is from the pen of DR. ABEL STEVENS, already known as the author of a popular history of Methodism. The two volumes now published bring the history of the Church down to nearly the close of the eighteenth century. Notwithstanding the many difficulties attending the work, the chief of which is the paucity and inaccuracy of documentary matter, DR. STEVENS has succeeded in presenting a very comprehensive and interesting history of the period included within the scope of these two volumes.

IN THE WINDOW.

Come the shadows deepening slowly,
Come the voices of the singing lowly,
Come the memories overcast
Of the unforgotten past.

Comes there to my listless seeming,
In between my doubt and dreaming,
Flinging back the gloom of night,
One sweet vision crown'd with light.

For a little gracious minute
Heaven is open'd, and within it
Sings a white and saintly maiden,
Lost to me, but found to Aideen.

Ah! when she kept her trysts with me
The blossom-time was in the tree;
As whispering she told her love
The sunlight kiss'd her from above;

The sun set crimson on the sea,
The silver mists came o'er the lea,
The stars shone out, and one star, I,
And dream'd upon the silent shore.

But the glorious summer light
Is blotted grimly by the night;
And the sweetest flowers that blow
Lie buried underneath the snow.

I remember, in my sorrow,
One Golden Day of Memory,
When the angels call'd her sister,
Took her in their arms and kiss'd her.

In the silence memories taunt me,
In the gloom these dead dreams haunt me;
But amidst the shades of night
Sings a maiden, robed in light.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

NOTES AND QUERIES.

INFANT.—We do not know whether one WILLIAMS are born in December than in any other month, but we think it not improbable from the number of Christmas nests with.

LYDIUS.—It is not usual to kiss a young lady when you are introduced to her for the first time. If you take your hat into a room when you call, you are not expected to sit with it on.

S. SINGE.—We are not acquainted any certain cure for a bald head, except cutting it off. The operation is painful, but effectual.

STRANGE PHENOMENA IN PRIVATE LIFE.

The aged lady who recently saved her old umbrella was rewarded last week with a crop of parasols.

A Mr. Augustus Smith quadrupled his sum walking down Broadway one afternoon, a few days ago, when all of a sudden he was observed to turn round.

FOOTE fell asleep while Opie was taking his portrait. On leaving, the painter requested him to give him another sitting. "On one condition," said Foote, "that you do not give me another likeness."

A "POSER" FOR MILITARY HEROES.—How can fields be won—OHS?

ADDRESSED TO JUNIUS.—When the butler marries the housekeeper may he be said to lead her to the high mental altar?

STRANGE CURATE. "Where does this path go to, my man?"

HALF-WITTED RUSTIC. "Don't know where 's goes to, but 's generally 'eresbouts this time of day."

THE WRONG END OF IT.—A very terrific story of Orient, all plunder and cruelty was laid to the wounds of the pagon. It turns out to be without foundation; in fact, instead of there having been a head cut off, it was only a hole.

EPITAPH ON AN ANGLER.—"Hooked it."

A LEGAL QUERY, AND ITS ANSWER.—Where are Politicians filed? We confess.

What true does a person resemble who is tired of the Irish melodies?—The sick-of Moore, of course.

A SOLDIER ON THE DRAFT.

The clouds of war were brightening fast
As through the land it sweeping went;
It came from good old Uncle Sam—
Dated Washington—signed Abraham.

He purpos'd was he must not know,
That the boys at home should a soldering go,
And that night when he was all in bed
And stared at the three hundred thousand more.

"I'm sick," says one; "I'm sick, you see;
Soldering may do for you and me
To fix out my brains and hatch a plan
To get my name from the drafting man."

"And I," says another—"I'd like to go,
But I've got a corn in my right toe,
And it hurts me so, and so, you see,
Soldiering could not do for me."

Another says, "I'd like to fight,
But I have a difficulty with my sight;
I'm hard of hearing in my ears;
So soldiering never 'll do for me."

Another coolly talks of the draft,
For he's got a substitute, and got him fast;
So he talks very bravely, for he doesn't fear
Uncle Abe or draft for at least a year.

Now, boys, we'll give you a little advice:
Before you're ailing consider twice;
Uncle Sam wants men, and some must go
To fill the ranks of the foe.

Then, boys, just think this question o'er:
Don't be scared at the thousands more;
But remember that each one's come to a man
Is part and parcel of Uncle Sam.

PROVERB FOR THE HIPPOPHAGISTS.—The proper place for the horse is in the stable.

Put the most ignorant man in the world in irons, and he will soon comprehend the meaning of "Lock on the Human Understanding."

THE WIDE-PITE.—Pipes, say anti-tobacconists, are all more or less injurious. Some pipes, such as wooden pipes, have, it is true, preserved, an antimetical tendency, affecting the brain more than others. Furniture-men must be ready-and the sellers' favorite pipe, the hornpipe, when indulged in too violently.

NEW FASHION.—It is proposed to make the Opera-crutinate of a more durable and cheaper stuff, called "Rep." I think this is rather fishy economy. The fashionable gentry of our highly civilized nineteenth century will be walking about the streets, like Snake-charmers, with Rep-tiles on their heads.

A HEBREW COMPARISON.—A medical practitioner, paying a professional visit the other day to the wife of a famous lawyer who had been afflicted for years with that enumeration of an acute character, interrupted his patient as he was describing the symptoms of his malady by asking his last visit. His interrogation was promptly answered by the sufferer with the words, "Oh! doctor, I feel so queery like: I feel just like a bailed action." "How so?" declaring practitioner, quite confounded at the lawyer's simile. "Why," answered the, casting a furtive glance at his questioner, "because I have not been able to get a verdict." The poor woman's uniqueness was readily understood by the doctor, who prescribed accordingly.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE record of news for the week contains no very important events. Congress has been adjourned for the holidays, and the only very interesting item of military news is the surrender of Fort Fisher, at the mouth of New York.

From this Message we learn that the deficit in the revenue of the general fund has been reduced within the fiscal year ending September 30, 1864, by the sum of over $300,000, leaving the receipts for that period $112,000. The State debt is now $6,378,954, a reduction during the year of nearly a quarter of a million of dollars. The Governor urges some important measures, among which are an appropriation for the Normal School; a law authorizing the resolution for an amendment to the Constitution, creating a court of Appeals; a change in the pay of police, and an amendment in the law for the registration of voters.

THE WILMINGTON EXPEDITION.

We have expressed on page 23 a map of the scene of General Butler's and Admiral Porter's operations at the mouth of Cape Fear River. We have Admiral Porter's report, giving the details of the operations of the fleet. Great hopes seem to have been built up on the success of a new contraband scheme. It seems the steamer Louisiana had been converted into a monitrous torpedo, charged with 'commander of powder "supposed to be sufficient to explode the powder magazine of the fort, and placed under the command of Commander A. C. Rhind. It was intended, previous to the attack, to explode this torpedo in close proximity to Fort Fisher, and thereby paralyze the garrison and materially injure the defensive works.

Porter sailed from Beaufort December 18 for the rendezvous, which was twenty miles east of New Inlet. He there found Butler on board with the transports. A gale from the southwest set in on heavily on the 19th that Porter determined to ride it out. The transports had to put back to Beaufort, so that when a favorable gale sprang up, Porter was on hand, and Butler out of sight. It was a little after midnight, on the morning of the 24th, that the torpedo was exploded. The preliminary affair was an utter disappointment. Indeed, the garrison in Fort Fisher supposed the explosion to be nothing more than the blowing up of one or our gun-boats. "The shock," says Porter, "was nothing like as severe as we expected. It shook the vessels some, and broke one or two glasses, but nothing more."

At daylight, the same day, the attack was opened from the fleet. The principal vessels engaged were the Ironsides, Canonicus, Mahopac, Monadnock, Minnesota, Colorado, Wabash, Susquehanna, Powhatan, Juniata, Brooklyn, Rowhatan, Juniata, Seneca, Shenandoah, Pawnee, Tuscarora, Mackinaw, Unadilla, Osceola, Ticonderoga, Iroquois, Quaker City, Monticello, Rhode Island, Sassacus, Chippewa, Yantic, Tacony, Ponatoska, Sonoma, Huron, Sagamore, Jackson, and Vanderbilt, having a reserve of small vessels, commanded by Acting Lieutenants Wyburn, Greenbes, A. D. Vance, Ascencio, Eckno, Gettysburg, Alabama, Keystone State, Banshee, Emma Lilliley, Governor Buckingham, Britannia, Governor Buckingham, and Nansemond.

Fort Fisher, the capture of which was the main object of the expedition, is situated on Federal Point, a narrow strip of land north of New Inlet. It is a strong earthwork, commanding the entrance to Cape Fear River. It is connected with a system of isolated batteries and rifle-pits running from the main work down to the extremity of the point. The land defenses on the north and west face are very strong, and defended by heavy batteries. The sea-face is also very powerful, and is the strongest. The main wall is about eight feet high, with a ditch in front, and is constructed with several of Dunn's rebel-guns, protected by traverses, beneath which are the bomb-proof quarters for the gunners.

At the very extremity of the Point is a mound battery. It consists of a mound thirty feet high, and is joined with railroad iron. In the river at the rear of the fort are three guns, which seem to be chiefly relied on for our fleet. The coast is lined with batteries from Federal Point to Smithsborough Inlet, a distance of fifteen miles. The most important of these is Half Moon Battery, a short distance from the point where Butler landed. On Oak Island Fort Caswell is situated, commanding the channel between Oak and Smithville islands.

The guns of Fort Fisher made no reply to Porter's until after a bombardment of over an hour. Two magazines have exploded, and the fort had been set on fire in several places. The explosions were continuous and heavy during the day. At night Butler appeared with his transports. The result of the day's operations had been a great success. According to General Bragg's statement the garrison of Wilmington was reduced to a mere handful. Porter says of the bombardment, "it was impossible for human beings to stand it." On the 25th it was not a man had been hurt by the enemy. But some disaster had occurred on board from the explosion of six 100-pound Parrott guns. Nearly fifty were killed or wounded by the explosion.

The next day Butler's command, consisting of nearly 7000 men, made an effort to land. There was considerable surf-boats, the fleet in the mean while silencing the guns of the fort. The troops landed five miles south of the position taken by the fleet. Only about 2000 men landed. At this moment was made, neither General Weitzel nor Butler deeming it practicable, Butler ordered the troops to Fort Fisher, only two of which had been disembarked, protected by traverses, and the remainder of the men and the whole of the artillery on a thousand men in line of battle. Weitzel and Butler's astonishment was then great to find the fort abandoned.

Meanwhile Porter's men had landed, had been captured at their guns, and the men and two officers taken by the rebel prisoners. Weitzel advanced his skirmish line to within fifty yards of the sea-face of the fort, when it was kept in their bomb-proofs by the fire of the fleet. Three or four men were wounded by the fire from our own vessels before the fort, capturing a horse, killing an orderly, and bringing off the orderly's dispatches. These facts were in a letter written by Butler to Porter. The latter appears to have differed with Butler as to the expediency of the immediate ability of an assault. He says, in his reply to Butler, "I have information that the rebel General Whiting and the officer who took the flag from the parapet, and the brave fellow who fired the magazine, are all killed. I think they would have found it an easier conquest than to appose."

On the 26th the troops were withdrawn. Admiral Porter still remained with his fleet.

NEWS ITEMS.

On the 31st of December, the Hon. George M. Dallas, formerly Vice-President of the United States, died suddenly in Philadelphia, in the 74th year of his age.

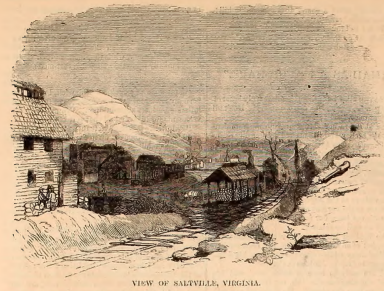
On the 29th of December the North America, of Philadelphia, from New Orleans to New York, Captain C. P. Hewlett, foundered at sea. She left New Orleans on the 16th, with 393 sick soldiers on board, 13 cabin passengers, and a crew of 34 men. Two hundred and ninety-seven lives were lost.

On Tuesday, December 24, issued a manifesto recognizing the Canadian raid on the steamer Michigan as a belligerent act, undertaken under the authority of the Confederate States.

FOREIGN NEWS.

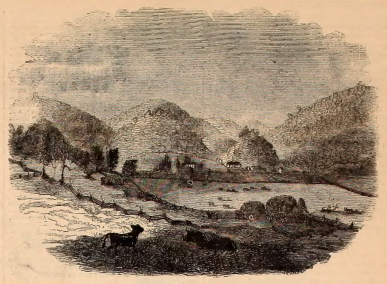
On the 8th of December a numerous deputation of the United States visited Washington to offer to Lincoln to congratulate him on President Lincoln's re-election. Sir Charles Lyell, who is very influential in Manchester, has made a speech on the occasion, in which he declared his belief that the United States is a struggle between a lower and higher civilization. It is not a struggle for empire, but for existence. He says the South had displayed was surprising. He thought, however, that the North with the resources of opposition had insured the overthrow of slavery.

The Japanese embassy to Europe has been taken up by a strong Southerner to a friend in Manchester, giving a graphic picture of the feeling in the South. He says the people are strongest than the complete extinction of slavery. He thinks that the success of Hood in Tennessee and Sherman has successfully taken the first step in his victorious career.



A trial of considerable political importance has recently been concluded in Madrid. Certain Democrats were arraigned for sedition because they met at the house of M. Olozaga, formerly Minister to the United States, to confer on the best means of securing a return of certain constitutional liberties. They were charged with, in opposition to the imperial edict of 1850, forbidding associations of more than twenty. Strictly speaking, such a act was not violated, as less than twenty persons were present at the meeting. They were nevertheless found guilty.

From this tribunal they appealed to the Court Imperials, where the judgment was confirmed. This, it would seem, settles forever the illegality of political association in France. For them men were not plotters; they did not meet in secret; indeed they were not composed of one party alone, but of several. The names of the accused were Garnier Pagès, Carnot, Dreo, Havaid, Cumagnac, Goudchaux, Peyrat, Cavaignac, Carlos, Lanfrain, Hadelaine, and Bery.



On the 2d instant, the French Emperor's private Secretary, died December 9. He was born in 1790, and has been an earnest supporter of the Bonaparte family throughout his career.

GENERAL HAZEN'S DIVISION, FIFTEENTH CORPS, STORMING FORT M'ALLISTER, December 13, 1864.—SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 27.]

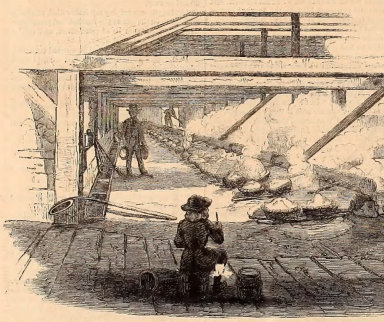
GENERAL BURBRIDGE'S RAID IN SOUTHWESTERN VIRGINIA.



GENERAL S. G. BURBRIDGE, whose brilliant expedition into Southwestern Virginia we illustrate from sketches taken by "Porte Crayon," has been one of the most efficient officers in our western campaigns. Our readers will remember the heroic conduct of General A. J. SMITH's Division at the capture of Fort Hindman, better known as Arkansas Post, January 11, 1863. The first brigade of this division was commanded by General BURBRIDGE, and performed the most distinguished part in the action of that day, having been selected for the assault, which resulted in the capture of the post. BURBRIDGE in person entered the fort before even the rebel guard was aware of the surrender. He had previously distinguished himself in the attack made on Vicksburg in December, 1862. Subsequently General BURBRIDGE at Corioth and Columbus, and more recently in Kentucky and East Tennessee, has well earned the Major-Generalship, which rank he now holds by brevet.

After General GILLEM's defeat, November 12, 1864, BRECKINRIDGE had possession of Bull's Gap. GILLEM's command was then joined by four thousand mounted men, making a force of full six thousand men, General STONEMAN assuming command of the whole. This column started from Bean's Station December 12. The rebel General DUKE, at Kingsport, opposed the crossing of the Holston, but was flanked and routed by GILLEM with a loss of one hundred men. The pursuit was continued to Bristol, on the Virginia border, which was occupied the next day, two hundred and fifty additional prisoners having been captured, and a large amount of property destroyed. VAUGHAN, who was twelve miles below at Zollicoffer, started immediately for Saltville, which was about thirty miles east of Bristol, but was headed off at Abingdon, which place was captured on the 14th. GILLEM pursued VAUGHAN, and, coming up with him, succeeded in taking fifty prisoners; and again at Mount Airy, where he took more prisoners and seven guns. VAUGHAN had now been driven several miles east of Saltville. Beaten in the morning at Mount Airy he was attacked at Wytheville in the afternoon, where he lost five more guns. The railroad was struck near Glade Spring, and two trains of cars captured. All the bridges and depôts were destroyed to Wytheville; also the great iron-works near Marion.

Returning, BRECKINRIDGE's command was encountered. After an engagement of thirty-six hours the enemy fell back on Saltville; but an attack made on his flank drove him southward. The lead mines near Wytheville were destroyed.

The most important success of the expedition was the destruction of the salt-works at Saltville. These were captured on the night of the 20th with eight pieces of artillery. The works, according to BRECKINRIDGE, can not be repaired during the war. General LEE, however, relying perhaps on the too favorable report of BRECKINRIDGE, thinks they can be easily repaired.

Saltville is in Washington County, 288 miles west of Richmond, near the North Fork of the Holston

River, and eight or nine miles north of the Virginia and East Tennessee Railroad. A branch road connects it with the latter. The salt manufactories here is of the very best quality. The works have been deemed so important by the rebels that a Richmond paper lately declared the loss of Savannah an inferior consideration.

"The valley at the head of which Saltville stands," says "Porte Crayon," "contains several hundred acres of rich meadow. It is surrounded by a chain of wooded hill, from 500 to 600 feet in height, so regularly formed that, but for their extent, they might be mistaken for artificial mounds. At the distance of 250 feet below the surface is a bed of fossil salt. The salt is procured by sinking beds to the depth of the salt-bed, when the water rises within 15 feet of the surface, and is raised from thence by pumps into large tanks, or reservoirs, elevated a convenient distance above the surface. The brine thus procured is a saturated solution, and for every hundred gallons yields twenty-two gallons of pure salt. The process of manufacturing it is very simple. An arched furnace is constructed, probably 150 feet in length, with the doors at one end and the chimney at the other. The two or heavy iron kettles, shaped like shallow bowls, are built into the top of the furnace. Large wooden pipes convey the brine from the tanks to these kettles, where the water is evaporated by boiling, while the salt crystallizes and is precipitated. During the operation a white saline vapor rises from the boilers, the inhalation of which is said to cure diseases of the lungs and throat. At regular intervals an attendant goes round and with a manual hoists dips out the salt, chucking it into loosely-woven split baskets, which are placed in pairs over the boilers, to drain and drip until the dripping brine has gone his round with the ladle. It is then thrown into the salt-shells, immense magazines on either side of the furnace. The salt thus manufactured is of the purest quality, white and beautiful as the driven snow. Indeed, on seeing the men at work in the mornings with pick and shovel, a person would swear they were working in a snow-bank; while the pipes and reservoirs, which at every leak become coated over with snowy concretion, glistening like hoar-frost and icicles in the sun, serve to confirm the wintry illusion. To avoid land-carriage the brine is led to the banks of the Holston, and manufactured on the spot. The salt is packed in barrels and is carried Westward down the river, or eastward, on the railroad. An immense copper establishment is the characteristic adjunct of the lower salt-works."

The results of this expedition are very important. All the depôts of supplies in Southwestern Virginia, foundries, mills, stores, and trains were destroyed. Twenty-five hundred rounds of artillery ammunition, two thousand horses, and one thousand mules were captured; also four rebel printing-presses and two editors. The presses were sent to Parson Brownlow as a Christmas gift. The Federal loss did not exceed two hundred killed, wounded, and missing. The rebel loss, besides killed and wounded, were nearly a thousand men captured, including twenty-four officers.

A CHARGE AT THE BATTLE OF NASHVILLE.

We give on page 25 an illustration of a charge made by the Third Brigade of the First Division, Sixteenth Corps. This brigade belonged to M'Pherson's old army of the Tennessee. That fact alone speaks volumes in its behalf. The charge of the Third Brigade of Smith's rushed in the captain of a strong rebel work and several guns, was one of the most brilliant of the many brilliant achievements of the rebellion's gallant army on 15th and 16th of December, 1864.

Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH writes to the Daily News a very high estimate of Admiral Bullery powers. He has met with him at City Point, and regards him as "in all points, good and evil, a thorough aristocratic chief." Like Buxton, he has walked straight on his wild way, fearless of danger, and careless reckless of opinion. I do not worship revolutionary characters; I hate the element from which they spring, as I love the calm progress of regular improvement. An old revolutionist is a man who has outgrown his melancholy annate Better will occupy a broader and perhaps a less elaborate page than is necessary supposed it has struck a medal for the negro suffrage with "Fiere la libertas provenire!" for the motto, and he has made the motto," says Mr. Goldwin Smith, "a practical truth."

How to Lay Ghosts.—In a Church publication entitled "Church Work and Life in St. Albans," among other curiosities we actually had a "Form of exorcising a haunted house," offered, we suppose, for curiosity, but as something to be used now. It ends as follows: "Then let the bangs of the harbor upon the cross be inverted, and the upper part of the principal room in the house; and let the priest sprinkle the whole house with holy water, from top to bottom, saying: The Lesson. St. Luke, xix. 1, 10.

Memorial to the late Mr. Thackeray.—Immediately after Mr. Thackeray's death a committee of gentlemen with Mr. Shirley Brooks for Secretary, determined on the erection of a memorial to their friend, and obtained the sanction of the Dean of Westminster for its location in the Abbey. The exact site has now been selected, and will be in the east of the author of "Vanity Fair" will shortly be placed close beside the effigy of him whom Thackeray so honored and eulogized—Joseph Addison. The bust will be executed by Baron Marochetti, who was on terms of intimacy with Mr. Thackeray.

Most people think there are cares enough in the world, and yet numbers are very industrious to increase them. All of the resolute ways of doing this is to quarrel with a neighbor. A bad bargain may wax a man for a week; and a bad debt may trouble him for a month, but a quarrel with his neighbor will keep him in hot water all the year round.

How to Dress for a Photograph.—A lady or gentleman, having made up his or his mind to be photographed, naturally inquires, in the first place, how is he dressed so as to show off to the best advantage. This is by no means so small an important matter as many might imagine. Let me offer a few words of advice including dress. Orange color, for certain optical reasons, is photographically black. Blue is white; other shades or tones of color are proportionately between the two, they contain more or less of these colors. The progressive scale of photographic color commences with the lightest. The order stands thus: white, light-blue, violet, pink, mauve, dark-blue, lemon, blue-green, leather-brown, drab, carine, magenta, yellow-green, dark-brown, purple, red, amber, uniform, orange, deal black. Consequently it is to be much considered in connection with dress. Blondes can wear much lighter colors than brunettes; the latter always present better pictures in dark dresses, but neither look well in pure white. The most contrasting colors should be especially guarded against. In photography brunettes present a great advantage over blondes, because the lovely golden tresses lose all their transparent brilliancy, and look perpendicular black; while the brunette's "dreamy" or rapture to the poet, is misery to the photographer, for it is put entirely out. The photographer has no other way of removing the yellow color from the hair is to powder it with white chalk. This process gives to the whole picture a graphic tint as in nature. The same rule, of course, applies to complexions. Freckles are invisible as a rule; distance in an account of its yellow color, rendered more distinctly visible when photographed. The freckles are must be called in to the assistance of art. Here let me introduce word photography. Freckles are not black spots, in the most readily affected by light, and yellow the least; if, therefore, you can soften the contrast between red and free from tan and freckles while taking your delightful rambles at the seaside, there will be no need to call in art, and substitute a dark-green or yellow one in its stead. Blue tulle should be avoided, owing to the actinic rays of the sun thus white. Half a yard of yellow net, though not very becoming, will go further more efficacious, and considerably cheaper than a quart of kalydor. The cause of freckles is already known. The sun's rays have more than darkening of this salts of iron contained in the blood by the action of light. A freckled face is, therefore, an animated photograph.

Lincoln's Invited Friend.—Mr. Lincoln was very fond of "my friend." He knows a great many people well enough to call them by their first name, but he was a middle-man in the most literal sense of the word. "Whenever I see a man," says Mr. Dickens, "he and Lincoln, and never any body else, not to be a man, and after a little while I call him Bob, and go to the play, and finish in an exemplary way with kidney and lemonade." On the day of assassination, the officer came out so frightfully small, that, Leech told us, Lincoln was filled with horror when he saw him entering his dinner at the Garrick with a large knife. On the other hand, he was so approachable that he was an officer and a gentleman would be as unpardonable affront. So, after satisfying himself that the man in the room was to object to the club knives as enormous and gigantic for remunerative purposes, he made a courteous inspection, and with a grim dissatisfaction to demand small ones. After which he set other people at their ease by affability, action, and agreed that things in general were running so fast in England that "Punch" would have to be very powerful when we find pictured in his pages; and his friends, going to the theatre, would be asked, "Have you seen Punch?" "This happened to himself;" "I was present when he said that or such a thing."

Literary Curiosity.—The oldest newspaper in the world is published in Pekin. It is printed on a large sheet of silk, says, it is said, in the Chinese Empire appearance for upward of a thousand years.

Shakespeare in Bermuda.—A discovery of great interest in connection with England's greatest poet has recently been made in the offices of a firm of Birmingham solicitors. Among numerous papers belonging conveyances, grants, leases, etc., have been discovered relating to property situated in Somersetshire, and in the Bermudas, on the east side. These deeds bear dates from 1578 to about 1660. Among the witnesses to one of these deeds was present as the signature of several, and the name of William Shakspere himself is appended to the deed in his own hand. The deeds are in excellent preservation, and the whole are to be submitted to Mr. Halliwell, who believes that the seal attached to some of these deeds is likely to lead to some interesting discoveries, and to throw considerable light on our known Shakspearian relics.

It may impress our soldiers to know that their average height is greater by two inches than that of recruits in the British army. The average weight greater by eighteen pounds than that of British soldiers; and their average circumference of chest a quarter of an inch greater than that of certain French troops.

A humorous story is told of Baron Holloke's being on a visit to Lord Cole in Essex, and, accompanying a gentleman, notorious for his absence of mind, in a walk, during which they came to a stream. Being at a loss which to know the nature of the punishment, the chief justice signed his companion to precede him over the plank by. This being done, he friend sauntered on, and totally forgot him. The man, on reaching the opposite to release himself, and on asking a peasant who was passing by to do him on, received answer, and told his "I would not for nothing." He was soon set at liberty by the servants of his host, and afterward of an action for false imprisonment against a magistrate by some fellow who had sat in the stocks, on the ground that the defendant rightfully the charge and declaring it was no misdemeanor at all. His whip hand and whispered: "Brother, were you ever in the stocks?" The counsel indignantly replied, "Sir, I never was in the stocks, I have been," said the chief justice, "and I can assure you it is not the title you represent it."

Year following from St. Jerome, night will have been written of ladies of the present day: "Ah! I shall not live to see the day when the fashionable Christian They are those who dash their cheeks with red, and their eye with black—those who paint face, too white to be human, remind us of ideals—those who cut not shed a tear, instead in tracing a bow on the painted arches of their faces—those whose ripe years fail to teach them that they are growing old, and whose white hairs are made up of other people's hair—those who chalk wrinkles into the countenances reminiscent of youth, and those who affect the demeanor of bashful maidens in the presence of troops of grandchildren."

SHERMAN'S MARCH.

BY A SOLDIER.

Their lips are still as the lips of the dead,
The gaze of their eyes is straight ahead;
They tramp, tramp, tramp o'er ten thousand feet
Keep time to their muffled, mournful beat—
Rub-a-dub-dub! rub-a-dub-dub!

Ten thousand more! and still they come
To fight a battle for Christendom!
With canting, whining, and drawling lips unfurled,
The foremost men in all the world!
Rub-a-dub-dub! rub-a-dub-dub!

The foe is intrenched on the frowning hill—
A natural fortress, strengthened by art and skill;
But vain are the walls to those who face
The champions of the human race!
Rub-a-dub-dub! rub-a-dub-dub!

"By regiment! Forward into line!"
Then sabres, and guns, and bayonets shine.
O ye who feel your fate at last
Repent the old prayer as your hearts beat fast!
Rub-a-dub-dub! rub-a-dub-dub!

O ye who've waited and prayed so long
That Right might have a fair fight with Wrong
No more in fruitless prayer implore
But smite the foe with the wrath of God!
Rub-a-dub-dub! rub-a-dub-dub!

O Death! what a charge that carried the hill!
That carried, and kept, and holds it still!
The foe is broken and flying with fear,
While far on their route our drummers I hear—
Rub-a-dub-dub! rub-a-dub-dub!

"MAD AS A MARCH HARE."

"After all, who is there that dare truly boast of having a 'mens sana in corpore sano?' Don't all speak at once!"

The above rather abrupt query came from Jenkins, the broker, and was uttered to three other gentlemen who were his companions in a carriage, which vehicle was taking them townward from a visit to the Exford Lunatic Asylum. The talk had, naturally, been upon insanity.

Insanity generally, but especially that form of it called monomania. An odd thing had occurred to the visitors at the Asylum, which gave fine direction and force to the current of their conversation.

As it's not long, nor much out of place, perhaps it may as well be related.

The Medical Director, who was a Quaker, and somewhat of an original himself, had been suddenly called away while doing the honors of his establishment to Messrs. Jenkins & Co.

"I am sorry to have to leave you," said he "but"—and looking at a card, my friend here will show you over the place." He beckoned to a tall, and wiggled man, who stood near, with a grave smile on his face. "Friend Joseph," said this Doctor; "will thee take my place and show our visitors over the premises?"

"With pleasure, Amos," replied Joseph. "This way if you please, friends."

Then the party the visitors followed their guide, whose familiarity with the details of each patient's malady seemed to indicate that he was an old and experienced attendant. Each room was gone, and the tone and matter of his remarks, marked him as a man of fair breeding and no little culture.

So that his appearance considerably puzzled to "make him out," though unanimous in the feeling that he had given their visit much additional interest and pleasure. Each had accordingly found a courteous expression in their thanks as they bade him good-day, the Director not having reappeared.

"Ah, yes," said Jenkins; "said he, with grand dignity. Then, as if struck with a sudden idea, he continued, rapidly: "But if you really think I have been of service, you are able to repay it handsomely."

"How? how?" exclaimed the others.

Friend Joseph looked anxiously round, as though to assure himself that no one observed, then, drawing nearer and speaking hurriedly, in a suppressed voice, "By procuring me an engagement to dance in the Ballet, Mabille!" "Perhaps you are not aware that I am the most wonderful dancer in the world. In fact—but this is a secret—I am made of India rubber! I can stand on my head down. I will show you how—"

At this moment fortunately—for the visitors were in a pitiable state of embarrassment—the Doctor came hurrying up, whom, as soon as Joseph caught sight of, he whispered, earnestly, "Not a word to Amos!" and made off very undignified haste.

In a few words the Director gave the history of the unfortunate man whose care he had placed his guests (which history has nothing to do with the present sketch), and they departed. From this moment forward, as they rode homeward, took form and color, and at a certain point in this talk, Jenkins, who had said but little previously, addressed to Lord the observation which opens this article, viz.:

"After all, who is there that can truly boast of a 'mens sana in corpore sano?' Don't all speak at once."

This last remark was evidently ironical, inasmuch as no one evinced any haste to reply, but rather the reverse.

"The fact is, gentlemen," continued Jenkins, after giving them a little moment to ponder his previous question—"the fact is, as somebody once said, we have all at least one 'crotchet' on the brain. Why, even Cicero, the orator, and philosopher, 'he was crazy on the Constitution; Calhoun on Nullification;' and so forth, through all our great men. I've even heard that Jeff Davis and his friends are roaring mad on Secession. Even you yourselves—"

"What! Do you mean to assert that we—that I—?"

"Of course! You're all mild monomaniacs. You, for instance, Green, are insane on tobacco. Haven't you spent some hundreds—perhaps thousands—of dollars on experimental pipes and navigation?"

"Well, and what of it? I can tell you, Jenkins—"

"Never mind telling me now. You, Black, are insane on numismatics. Didn't you give twenty-five dollars to old Solomons for a worn-out half-penny—"

"Nonsense! It was a Queen—"

"Mah, perhaps. No matter. White, you're crazy as a bed-bug on—cricket" he hesitated.

"On what?" queried White, an eccentric old bachelor, who made himself miserable by striving to forget that he had got to die like the rest of mankind.

"Well, then, on undertakers." Did not you once drag me half a mile straight out of our way, while passing the establishment of one? And have not you even recorded your horror of that respectable guild in your diary?"

"I do hate an undertaker like the devil!" exclaimed White, with a grimace; "but that is not—"

"Then it is, though!" persisted Jenkins.

"And I myself am also slightly touched."

"Ha!" cried the trio in chorus.

"And pray, what's your mania?"

"Story-telling, perhaps," said the philosophic broker; "for I am reminded of one that is quite apropos to our conversation. Or, rather, not a story, but a personal experience in illustration of my theory. And if you like—"

* A fact. We mean the Incident, not the India rubber.—Narrator.

"Oh! by all means. Let us have it."

"After supper," said Jenkins. And after supper the party sat together on the broker's piazza and listened to his story, while the smoke of their cigars floated mistily up to the yellow harvest-moon.

II.

"You none of you know Skipwick, but he has been my friend for many years—more than friend, his intimate business acquaintance. I've made his investments for him, and all that sort of thing.

"Skipwick's father was a manufacturer of blacknil, and his son was brought up in the laboratory. He, the son, had quite a scientific turn, and was a good deal of a student; so much so as to injure his health; and when his father died he wound up the concern and retired with a handsome fortune. Indeed, however, he had retired with him—he was a bachelor of thirty odd—and for some years he employed himself in making scientific experiments, chemical and mechanical, and dabbling in patent inventions and the like.

"Then appeared the Fox girls with their mysterious rappings, and Skipwick instantly dropped all his other irons into the fire and went in wildly to discover and explain this mystery. Whether he succeeded or not I do not know, but being fairly astride of this bobby-horse he rode into the mists of biology, psychology, the odylic force, table-turning, and the rest, and I, being out in the sunshine of commonsense, lost sight of him for the time.

"Every now and then, by-the-bye, he would emerge wearily from the fog and un himself a little with me, but he seemed nervous and ill at ease in the commonplace atmosphere of practical life, and broke-ed after his dreamland. I never talked with him much of his new hobbies, for he seemed to wish to avoid the subject, and indeed seldom came to see me except upon business, for which he showed as clear a head as ever.

"At length, one sad day my father died, and Skipwick came on the day of the funeral, and pressed my hand, and bade me be of good cheer, and smiled comfortingly, and went away.

"About a month afterward he entered my office, just as I was going to dinner, and said, 'I have come for you.' 'I will walk home with you.'

"We walked up town together, I momentarily expecting him to tell me his news, but he was perfectly silent.

"'Well, Skipwick, what were you going to tell me?' I asked, at length, becoming impatient.

"'Don't hurry,' answered he, gravely. 'Wait till we are alone.'

"This rather alarmed me; not on my own account, because I thought some misfortune had befallen him.

"'You have not lost that copper stock, I hope?' I asked.

"'No.'

"'Has your house been robbed? or your pocket picked? or—'

"'No, no, no! Don't ask me any thing till we are at your house.'

"I looked at him. He was pale, and there was a restlessness in his eye I had never observed before. 'Drink?' I, or some woman has jilted him,' I thought; and yet let him alone, as we were seated in my study.

"'Now then, Skipwick!' said I, encouragingly.

"'Theodore,' said he—he always called me by my first name, being a half Quaker (his mother was Hickory)—'Theodore,' said he, putting his hand on my knee, 'I have seen your father.'

"'I know you have, often,' said I, innocently. 'What of it?'

"'Theodore,' said he, gravely, 'I saw him last night!'

"I confess that this startled me; but I instantly recovered, and replied, 'In a dream, I suppose.'

"'No, but in the spirit. I called upon him, and he received me.' I asked him how he looked when, and he said, 'Well.' I asked if he had a message for you, and he said, 'Tell Theodore his place is ready for him.'

"I looked at Skipwick again. His eyes still moved restlessly in their orbits, and he was even more pallid than usual. Instinctively I drew back my chair. 'Good God!' thought I, 'Skipwick is mad!' In the next instant a feeling of indignation took possession of me. 'He is not mad, I thought; but he is experimenting with his cursed psychology, or some other foolery, upon my feelings!'

"'Look here, Skipwick!' said I, 'you are an old acquaintance, but I'll be d——d [excuse me, gentlemen, but I was naturally excited] if your intimacy is to be a right to play off your mesmeric power upon me! And—' But before I could say more he arose and held out his hand.

"'I see you give you pain,' said he, sadly, 'and I beg you will forgive me. But I had the message, and it was given to me, and I thought, too, you would like to hear—' Well, well, I will say no more now,' said he, interrupting himself—'but the expression of your face would startle me, and to your epithet, I pass it over. You are still in the dark; but it will be all light some day, and you will do me justice. Good-day, Theodore.'

"He went away. Poor Skipwick! His brain was evidently weakened. I made but a gloomy meal that day. A week afterward he came to me to sell some stock for him.

"'It is a bad time to sell,' said I.

"'I can not help it. I must be done. I have bought a house, and it must be paid for and furnished.'

"'A house? Are you going to marry, Skipwick?'

"'No! It is not for myself.'

"'Ah! And may I inquire for whom it is?'

"'It is for my—for Mr. and Mrs. Cheetham.'

"'Relations of yours, I suppose?'

"'No. That is—yes—spiritually.'

"'Spiritual relations!'

"'Lord! Lord!'

"I questioned him, and, after much difficulty, discovered that Mr. and Mrs. Cheetham were two

'distinguished Mediums' from a 'circle' somewhere in New England, who had persuaded poor Skipwick to 'import' them for the purpose of assisting him in his 'spiritual' experiments.

"It was all over with him, I feared. He was in the hands of the Philistines, and he was no Samson with shorn locks that would grow again.

"Finding it worse than useless to attempt dissuasion or argument with him, I contented myself with some business advice as to his retaining the ownership of house and furniture, sold his stock, and paid him the money—ten thousand dollars. Once more he vanished into the fog, riding recklessly sea-ward."

III.

"His family ought to have placed him in an asylum!" exclaimed Green, as Jenkins paused for a moment.

"He had no family nearer than dubious cousins."

"His friends, then."

"Humph! He was over forty, and worth a quarter of a million. But we live in America, not England. Besides, 'spiritualism' has not yet been decided to furnish ground for personal restraint, the more's the pity! Let me go on:

"One day I took an odd fancy to have a look at, and a word with the two 'distinguished mediums' who were furnishing Skipwick with shadows in return for his 'substance.' So I rang the bell of a small, neat brick house in a quiet street, with 'CHEETHAM' on the door-plate. A thin, freckled-faced woman—with a remarkably sharp eye, and hair that looked as if a clip of the barber's shears would be sure to make it bleed—opened the door.

"'Is Mr. Cheetham at home?'

"'He is;' curtly, and holding the door ajar.

"'Can I see him for a moment?'

"'I'll see. Who shall I say, Sir?'

"'He does not know my name. Say a friend of Mr. Skipwick's.'

"'Oh! step into the parlor. I will communicate with my husband.'

"The lady with the sanguinary tresses was Mrs. Cheetham. She would 'communicate' with Mr. C. I fancied that perhaps she was about to advise him 'spiritually' of my presence by rapping on the ceiling, or ordering some of the furniture to give him notice to that effect. But no: she simply went up stairs like a mere human being to tell him, and he presently made his appearance. His manner and matter of greeting, as well as the man himself, instantly brought his prototype before my mental eye as a great Master had portrayed him. 'Ecce Chadband!' said I to myself.

"He was oily, bland, ponderous, and rolled his r's as though he delivered them off a spindle. Before I had listened five minutes to him I felt that he was a knave. I needn't try to repeat what he said. You've read plenty of that sort of stuff in the newspapers. He ended by offering his services to 'communicate' with any deceased friend or relative I might wish to hear from, and said that Mr. Skipwick was unfortunately too exacting and imperative; so that the 'manifestations' had not been, of late, as satisfactory as either he or Mr. S. could wish.

"The house, what I saw of it, was comfortably, even luxuriously, furnished; and I discovered, through a mild complaint of Skipwick's 'closeness' by Mr. Cheetham, that he and Mrs. C. received a regular 'salary' of two hundred dollars a month from Mr. S., besi'es incidental sums for 'spiritual' extras.

"In a word, Skipwick was fleeced by this precious pair to the tune of over three thousand dollars a year, exclusive of the house-rent, while they succeeded in 'fooling him to the top of his bent,' whatever that may be. It was a very tall 'bent' at all events!

"Not very long afterward Skipwick, coming to me on business as usual, in answer to my questions, told me he had found the Cheetham pair to be impostors, and had dismissed them.

"I congratulated him, and hoped his eyes were now opened.

"'But they were not. He had only changed guides to his blindness. He had another 'medium in his house. This one indubitably honest, and of high spirit-compelling power, but dear in proportion. He—the new 'Light'—was not married, but lived with his sister, a 'trance-medium' to whom Swedenborg was a mere 'dreamer of dreams.'

"Well, this was two years ago. Since then Skipwick has changed his 'spiritual relations' many times; but with every new 'blind guide' he has ridden deeper into the fog, nearer and nearer to the cliff, beneath which roars the wreck-strewn ocean of Madness! The last I heard of his 'hobby' he was trotting it alongside of the 'Davenport Boys' with their 'magic cabinet' on his back.

"He comes regularly to see me on business, about which he talks—as indeed he does about every thing save one—shrewdly and consistently. I see him often in the street, walking, with his head down, rapidly, and his lips in constant motion, as if holding 'communication' with the 'unseen world.' He even occasionally drops in here of an evening when his talk is chiefly of the rebellion, which, he says, on the authority of the 'spirits,' is 'all right' and 'part of the great plan.' What the 'great plan' is, however, the 'spirits' have not as yet vouchsafed to inform him.

"He has not fortunately much diminished his estate to feed his folly, but devotes at least two-thirds of his income to the 'Cause of Spiritualism.' He is a perfect Providence to many 'circles' both here and in other cities; and no amount of disappointment, detection of fraud, or falsehood seems to shake his faith in the abstract truth of the spiritual doctrines."

"He will surely end in the asylum!" said Mr. White. "There are no undertakers out there, at any rate!" added he, grimly.

"You're mistaken," retorted Green.

"There are two—as patients."

"Glad of it! Serves 'em right!" growled the old bachelor.

"Well, Jenkins," said Black, thoughtfully, "it's a great pity, certainly, about your poor friend Skipwick; but what inference do you draw from his case? Do you mean to say that he proves your assertion that all of us are 'mild monomaniacs?'"

Just as Jenkins was about to answer a step came rapidly up the brick walk toward the porch, and a voice said,

"Good-evening, Theodore! Ah! I thought you were alone."

"Only old friends. Walk up, Skipwick."

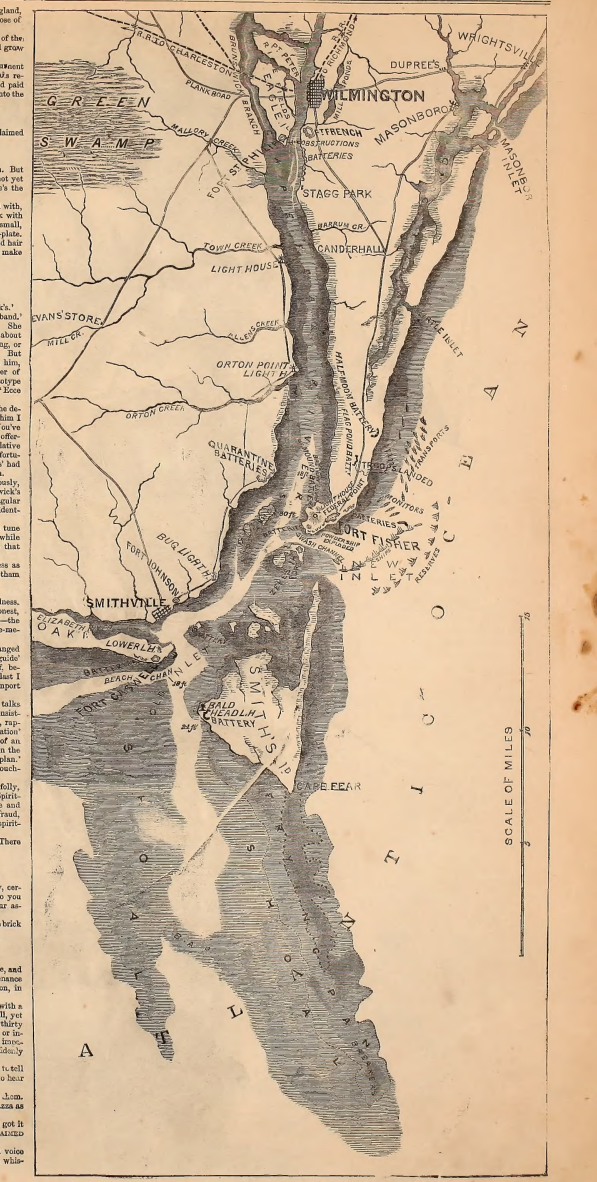
The new-comer came up the steps and was briefly introduced.

He was a middle-sized man, with a pale face and deep-sunk eye, and his lips had a tremulous motion in them, even when his countenance was in repose. Otherwise a gentlemanly, quiet looking person, in grave attire.

This night he seemed in unusually good spirits, and talked with a nervous flow of words, like a man who has a secret he itches to tell, yet can not find nor make a fitting opportunity. After sitting some thirty minutes, however, during which he had made no allusion, direct or indirect, to his "mania," but had listened with interest, though inattentively, to Jenkins's account of their visit to the Asylum, he suddenly rose and said,

"I did not know you had company, Theodore; I only stopped to tell you the glorious news. These gentlemen will no doubt be glad to hear it also." He paused, and seemed to hesitate.

"Certainly; good news is always welcome!" exclaimed all at once.



Skipwick walked rapidly up and down the top step of the piazza as he continued,

"It was very hard to obtain a decided manifestation, but we got it at last, and I am able to assure you that PEACE WILL BE PROCLAIMED ON THE 4TH DAY OF MARCH, 1865."

Having delivered this strangely-positive prediction in a loud voice and with a violent gesture, he said "Good-night!" almost in a whisper, and was gone.

"As mad as a March hare!" cried Mr. White.

And the others responded, "Amen!"

"BY-AND-BY."

WAS the parting very bitter?
Was the hand-clasp very tight?
Is a storm of tear-drops falling
From a face all sad and white?
Think not of it, in the future
Calmer, fairer days are nigh;
Gaze not backward, but look onward
For a sunny "by-and-by."

Were some whispered words too cherished?
Was the touch of lips too sweet?
Are two souls unclasp linked together
Never, never more to meet?
Never here, earth's poor, vain passion
Slowly smoulding out must die,
But its ashes shall return you
Something purer "by-and-by."

Was the priceless love you lavished
Sought for, played with, and then slighted
Were its crushed and quiv'ring remnants
Calmly thrown you back again?
Calmly too the remnants gather,
Bring them home without a sigh,
Sweet returns they yet shall bring you
In a coming "by-and-by."

Is your frail boat tossed and battered,
With its sails all torn and wet,
Crossing o'er a waste of waters
Over which your sun has set?
To the shore all calm and sunlit,
To the smooth sand warm and dry?
Faith shall bear your shattered vessel
Safely, surely, "by-and-by."

Are the eyelids very weary,
Does the tired head long for rest,
Are the tempics hot and throbbing,
And the hands together pressed?
Hope shall lay you on her bosom,
Cool the poor lips parched and dry,
And shall whisper "Rest is coming,
Rest forever, 'by-and-by.'"

And when calmed and cheered and freshened
By her soul-inspiring voice,
Then look up, the heavens are bright'ning,
Cease your sighing and rejoice;
Cry out not for days departed,
None will bear you, none reply;
But look on where light is breaking
O'er a brighter "by-and-by."

MARGARET MILLER.

A STORY IN NINE CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER VII.

FOREST LAKE is one of the myriad gems of the peninsula. Excessive weariness could not blind me to that fact the first night of my arrival. The last mile or two of the way lay along its margin, every turn revealing some new beauty. The wild orange, magnolia, and bay loaded the air with perfume, while giant oaks draped their mossy arms in the wave and grasped their own shadows.

The carriage drove through a little village of cabins just as the sun was setting. The fieldhands were home from labor, and stood bowing and courtesying, trying to get a peep at the newcomer—every arrival being an event on these isolated plantations. A large gate, swung open by a little negro, admitted to the grounds surrounding the mansion—a tasteful, unpretending house, southern in every feature. We were welcomed by the barking of dogs, the strutting of sea-fowl, the scream of guineas, and the somersaults of two or three young darkeys. Two little girls peeped in the shade of the veranda as the piazza, and a gray-haired quadroon, with bright eyes and intelligent face, came to the carriage to assist and welcome me.

"The young lady Mars'r George sent for Mammy Rose to come and take care on," she said, in a pleasant tone.

"No," I replied. "I am Miss Miller, the children's governess." I knew nothing of Mars'r George, and thought the old woman mistaken in the arrival.

The little girls were too timid to approach me readily, but stole sly glances into the room where I went to lay aside my traveling garb.

"Don't be 'fraid, honeys," said their nurse; "go in and tell the lady 'How d'ye?'"

"Why don't she wear pretty, bright dresses, Tilly? Say! why don't she?"

"Hush, you! Somebody's done gone dead!" "Like our mamma?"

"Yes, honey, like Miss Ann."

A substantial supper was waiting—chickens, bacon, rice, coffee, and hot cakes. The little girls sat opposite, in a small-servant did the waiting; while Tilly, with an immense brush of peacock's plumes, fanned away the flies, and kept up an artificial breeze.

Such was my introduction to Forest Lake.

My room was a very pleasant one, with windows opening out on the lake, from which came a wild scream of water-fowl the livelong night. Old Rose—Mammy Rose as she was called—came in the morning with a cup of coffee, and a face full of prying kindness.

"Poor child!" she said. "All bruises from head to heart. Lie still to-day, and let mammy nuss ye. De good Lord will heal in his own time. 'Twas like you is a tender flower."

I let her talk on; there was something in the plaintive minor of her voice, and her words were picturesque and poetical, the language of a double race. Very little of the genuine African was betrayed either in her features or dress, which was plain and simple enough to have characterized a lady.

The little girls, hearing her voice, came to the window, and held in handfuls of roses without offering their faces.

"They's dying to see you, Miss, but are as shy as young rabbits. They were talking about the sweet lady this morning before they said their prayers."

"Can you not coax them in? I love children dearly."

"They'll soon find is out, Miss! They wasn't long finding that Miss Poultney were not fond of them."

"Who was she?"

"Some kin to their mother, who came to teach and take care of them. But she got on easy and homesick-like here, and nobody could suit her. Mars'r George did his best, and when he fails that's no wrong. She went back to Carlinar about a week since."

Another little hand was seen among the curtain, holding a gorgeous Bahama lily. Mammy Rose took it as she had done the others, and gave it to me, saying as she did so,

"Go away, Miss Jessie, and bring your sister. The lady wishes to see you."

Light footsteps were heard on the piazza; soft, whispering voices near the window, but no children came. Rose went away soon "to look after the house," she said, charging me to be still all day; instead of which I arose, dressed, and went down to the lake-side.

A boy was fishing near the wharf. Seeing me, he raised his hat, bowed and grinned with the air of an old acquaintance. It was not the coarseness of that I was certain. Had I ever seen him before? I could not tell; they were all alike to me.

Two little hands led me up the shell-walk to the cottage, when Mammy's breakfast was ready —little Jessie's and Georgia's. Two little mouths gave me kisses, and two little hands pulled and called me, as I bade them, Miss Margy. The new governess was no longer a stranger.

The lessons began by degrees, and soon became the absorbing amusement of the morning; mos cold, dry tasks, but pleasant talks about pleasant things. Little slates had their figures, and little copy-books letters and words to be imitated, until they could answer papa's letters, and get the reward he had promised them. No other incentive was ever needed than to please him.

An old piano, hoarse from disuse, stood in the parlor. I opened it, wiped the mould from the wires, limbered the keys, and tried "Rousseau's Dream," my first lesson. The children were delighted. Even with others in the house, and struggles to forget pain, passed the first days at Lake Cottage.

In about two weeks a letter came from Colonel Hamilton—a letter as puzzling in some of its allusions and inquiries as the Sphinx's riddle, until little Georgia had explained away the enigma, and left me in a tumult of feelings difficult to describe.

"Don't you see, Jessie, this is papa's pretty seal? Doesn't he write nice letters, Miss Margy?"

The child had picked up the envelope, and was examining the monogram with curious eyes. How stupid I had been from the first, when, as I now recollected, the truth had been told me half a dozen times or more! "Your sister's motherless children—father going to the war!" Hadn't he said this on one occasion nothing prevented his acceptance of a commission? And two brothers-in-law children? The coincidence of name alone should have been sufficient to open my eyes to the fact; but who ever attaches importance to a name? And now, I understood better those mysterious words in the letter: "Should anything still you recall me," as well as Mammy Rose's welcome, and Tom's persistent recognition. How stupid I had been not to understand them, but for the one great, absorbing event which had made me insensible to every thing but grief.

I strove hard to remember anything to find fault with in the review of the engagement—nothing was palpable but my own dullness. When planning the meeting, had I not hinted to him of one in procuring a situation? He might at least have been frank about it, I said to myself, and I said to him in my reply, in which I made a full confession of stupidity.

His rejoinder disarmed me. He wrote:

"Forgive me, my sister, for thinking you were not quite certain you did not comprehend the arrangement. I did not suppose I should ever presume to ask you for brother, to watch over and protect you until such time as you could go under the protection of a husband. I could have found situations where you would have had more society, and perhaps more pleasant ones, but the friends of yours—some persons not afraid of Northern sentiment seemed to offer you a home, but I could not bear the intolerant of 'Northern sentiment' at present, especially when I knew that the children I had left would be under you should be subjected to the slightest annoyance for opinion's sake. I feel, then, in your previous letter, that society would only burden you, and that you needed rest. I have, therefore, had a lady this day visit Lake Cottage, where I can certain the servants will be devoted to you, and you can be to them your own mistress."

So far for your interest. Now for considerations more sacred.

"With every confidence in my housekeeper and other servants, I have not thought it best to leave my little ones entirely to them. The lady who has had care of them since their mother's death has to cancel a debt when wishing to be relieved, and I would gladly have every shilled in my pocket soonet than run the risk of supplying her loss. Advertising without success, I was on the point of writing to you, when I met with a lady of the highest recommendation come to my aid, and remain with my children—and at the same time—

"But if you have any regrets, Miss Margy; if the place is not agreeable, or you feel that it is too isolated and lonely, or the children trouble you, remember, my sister, my window sash is open, and you have only to say the privilege of serving you in some other way. Let me beg you, then, to be candid, and trust me as you would a brother.

"I am enrolled for the war, so you will not apprehend my presence at the lake. The clouds grow thicker and darker every hour. The sacred soil of Virginia is already red with blood. I love to think that you are out of reach of its ravages, almost of its rumors."

"Mammy Rose and the children are very happy. May God bless them and you!"

I was wholly disarmed. Why should pride strive to put me on a pedestal for me not to be turned against myself? Why could not I take as freely and as independently too for a friend as for a stranger? Colonel Hamilton could never be less than a friend, and when had friend proved less selfish or more deserving? For Robert's sake I would abide in the warm, sheltering haven I had so unwittingly entered until the storm was past.

My next letter was pronounced "most satisfactory."

The calm uniformity of life at Lake Cottage suited me entirely. I felt no need of society; my life was in the past—at present duties were neither distasteful nor irksome. Robert was in all my thoughts. His Bible lay on my stand; his quotations were in my watches. Our watchwords were wound each day, and kept time together; and two glossy brown locks of his hair were often wet with tears. I sometimes felt as though his presence was with me, and the thought made me almost happy.

The weekly papers—we had but a weekly mail—spoke continually of strife and contention; but it seemed like a dream only, when no one expected the terrible reports. The distant booming of cannon one clear summer morning told me that the Army of the Union had again suffered defeat. But no wild exultations, no joy-bells, no thanksgiving in the churches assailed me in my secluded sanctuary; and my heart tolled its own knells in peace for Bull Run and Manassas.

The children's progress was wonderful, and their first letter to their father the event of the season, to them at least. For some time they were busy with their studies and exercises. They played less than usual during play-hours, came often to ask how to spell a word, and sometimes brought a slate for me to add a capital letter for them. Tilly was in their secret, and looked both wise and important whenever Mammy Rose inquired what the young people were about so very quiet. I only half suspected the truth until they came to ask me to fold and direct the precious manuscript, and, without curious inspection, knowing well it was going to no severe censor.

Mammy Rose was overjoyed.

"O, Miss, you should have read it," she said. "No infants ever wrote such a letter before. Years like to have died when Georgie's heart grew. You should have seen how many times they thanked him for sending dear Miss Margy to us. Mammy Rose's old bones are getting old and stiff; but no matter now."

Rose was an exception to the ordinary rule of servitude. She had early been taught reading, writing, and needle-work. Her story is too sad a one to be narrated here. Often in my desolate hours, when grieving over my lot, her meek, tender assurance that the good Lord loveth whom he chasteneth, and would heal the hearts he had wounded, fell like balm upon my weak faith in our common Father. What were my griefs to hers, who had seen every heartchord sundered save one, Isaiah Lazum, and not heavenly, and who yet, Christ-like, forgave and blessed her executor? When her record is written, it will be with those of saints and angels!

"Letter for you, Miss," said Tom, coming to my open window one day on his return from the Post-office, "all done up black."

A letter with a black seal, and from Kittie.

"Poor Gaston!" my natural exclamation while unfolding it. It was not the mother, as I supposed, but her only son, who had fallen on the battle-field—Kittie's idolized brother Gaston, in college only the winter before, when most of the students were so eloquent in his praise. Like many other gallant youth of Mississippi, he had responded to the call of his great statesman, and had fallen in the first engagement.

"Poor Gaddsen!" Kittie wrote. "He was too beautiful to be trodden underfoot in battle, and it breaks my heart to think of it. He had never an enemy, and why should he have been called to fight? I am brotherless now, you like, dear Margy, but I have also to pity you. I did not know before, though my heart ached sorely for you. Mother says it will kill her, and I am afraid it may, for Gaston was her dearest idol."

Poor Kittie! My heart ached sorely for her now—the gay, happy girl, drinking her first life-cup of sorrow!

Summer and autumn wore away. The cotton was picked and the cane ground. All the machinery of the plantation appeared to work as smoothly as though the master had not been hundreds of miles away. The overseer was a faithful old darkey, who came from Carolina when "Ole master" emigrated; and who, in consideration of faithful service, was left with "Young master" to look after the few negroes and two children were the bonds that bound him fast to slavery.

"I can leave Mary and the boys," he said, speaking to me one day of freedom. "Mars'r George gives me good wages to oversee, and I can make a better off by staying wid them. He has promised never to part us. But oh, missis! I would like to have dem boys learn to read, and know why de good Lord gives dem heads as well as hands."

Never from the two hundred servants did I hear a word of disloyalty to their master; their chief regret was in not being able to read and write. Many a midnight lesson they already read the mystic handwriting on the wall of their bondage, and foresaw that the days of the kingdom of oppression were numbered, and felt weak to cope with the intellect of a dominant race. I never sought conversation with them on these points, and whenever they were approached turned away to questions of everyday life and duty.

Often on Sunday evenings they would gather around the cottage-piazza to hear me read a chapter from the Bible—Colonel Hamilton, in one of his letters, having asked me to do this if not disagreeable to me, as it converted them at home on the Sabbath instead of strolling off to hear vagabond preachers. The first evening I read the Sermon on the Mount from beginning to end. Before its close some of the men had risen to their feet, and stood gazing with silent, rapt attention until I closed the book, when a simultaneous shout of "Glory!" like a camp-meeting cry, rent the air, and was echoed from the forest beyond the lake. A moment after a lame old woman, with wild, sparkling eyes, limped up to the piazza, drew something from under her silk apron folded carefully in two or three wrappings.

"Will good missis tell me of dis yer is like her book?" she said, handing an old Bible to me.

"Just the same, Dinah. God's books are all alike."

"No dey isn't!" she replied, positively. "Dem dar Carlinar Bibles ony one story—'Servants be 'bedient to yer masters.' Miss Poultney's one oh dem. Dis yer come from Georgia, and de good ole missus dar can to read like you read to-night. She'm dead and gone to glory, hallelujah!"

Fifty voices caught the shout, and began to sing—

"Glory, hallelujah!
We're all marching homeward
To de happy land!"

Little Georgia and Jessie sat upon low stools at my feet, their sunny young faces radiant with joy. Turning every now and then to Mammy Rose, they said, "Isn't it a good meeting, Mammy?" Wouldn't papa like to see them all so near?"

Those Sunday evening gatherings became a real pleasure to me, and formed a new link between me and the little sable community at Forest Lake. Afterward, when prostrate with sickness, I learned how grateful were the humor creatures for the few crumbs of Christ's comfort it was so pleasant to bestow.

CHAPTER VIII.

WINTER wrought but little change in the summer scenes of Forest Lake. It was difficult to write January in your remembrance when June roses were budding and blooming on every side. Occasional visitors from Colonel Hamilton came to break the monotony, all of which expressed great satisfaction at my contentment. In one of these he remarked, playfully, "I can now help congratulating myself on holding one prisoner! Cruel war has its compensations." In another: "Mammy Rose and the children write me difficult to write January in your remembrance when June roses were budding and blooming on every side. You opposed Sunday-school, I hear; shall have a chaplain's salary at the end of the year."

But as spring drew near I began to grow languid and restless. Unusual nervousness marred me, and I longed for something clear and crisp to give vigor to mind and body. Torturing headaches became of frequent occurrence, during which the sunshine was intolerable; and whenever I closed my eyes to the light two great yellow fires appeared as me mockingly. Fever succeeded. Thoughts of death came to me in the silent night-time, not dark and terrible, but calm and pleasant, like the soft whispers of loved ones. They were all with me again. My lost ones and their home was not far away, as I had fancied. The physician from Carlinarville remained constantly at the cottage, and Mammy Rose never left me day or night. I knew every thing that was passing around me, although regarded as unconscious. A hundred times I heard the tender inquiry, "Is she going to Jesus?" and would have replied, but the faculty of speech had quite deserted me.

The crisis came at an unusual stir at the cottage, where every thing had been silent so long. I tried to think what it meant, but was too weak and weary. Soon I heard a voice soft and low, but familiar, conversing with the doctor, who replied:

"The fever speaks, Sir—never opens her eyes; is too weak for the crisis, which must be near."

"O, Mars'r George! don't give way so. Tears like she knows Mammy Rose yet. Every sort here is praying de good Lord to recover her."

Those were the last sounds that fell on my ears for days. All the busy thoughts which filled my brain, all the feverish struggles which had been passing to and fro, fled. Life became an utter blank—void as the grave.

The first light on each darkness is indescribable—only a gleam—not comprehended, not palpable. Feebly as a new-born child seizes the first object presented to its vision, I grew to its own identity. "Who am I? Where am I?" were the first distinct thoughts that arose out of this chaos—the first utterances that shaped themselves on my lips.

"Dear Master!" God be praised!" was the rejoinder. Had the pleasant illusions returned? I could not tell.

Circumstance was in her favor now, Sir. Who would have thought it? Admirable constitution. Every thing must be kept just so quiet now. Doctor can take your place, Sir, and let you sleep. You are a great nurse, Colonel."

My next recollection is of a sweet, benignant face smiling down on me like a starlight, gentle hands smoothing my pillow; of tender tones falling on my ears like blessings. But the voice that answered my first faint inquiry was heard no more. I listened for it all that day and the next, and came to believe it had only been heard in a dream. Neither Mammy Rose nor my new nurse appeared to understand my allusion to it, or, if they understood, were indisposed to gratify my curiosity.

"Where are the children?" I asked, at length.

"Gone for a time to stay on two, honey. The doctor said you mustn't have the leastest bit of noise nohow, and we couldn't keep 'em away from you any longer.'

"Where have they gone, Mammy?"

"To Gainesville."

"Who went with them?"

"Tilly, and Tom too," she added. "But you are talking too much, honey; be quiet now, or Aunty Hamilton will find fault with Mammy."

Two days after, a tumultuous barking of the dogs announced my arrival. I listened for the sound of wheels or horses' hoofs in the carriage-way; there were neither. A soft, careful tread of feet, however, was on the back piazza, satisfied me I was not mistaken. No one else, perhaps, would have detected the footsteps; but so painfully acute had hearing become with sickness, I could think only of the "Warden of the Gods," whose steps were so like as he heard the flowers bloom and the grass grow in the heavenly meadows.

Mammy Rose came in soon, and Madam Hamilton, my new nurse, went out. Only two two, with the doctor, ever entered the apartment during my days of convalescence.

"My dear aunt, tell me exactly what you think of your charge now."

"Dear me!"

"Can I see her?"

"Not to-night, certainly. Doctor Hempstead is as peremptory as ever about excitement."

"I have to go at daybreak. My dispatches came to-day. We are on the eve of more activities; if I survive, I will endeavor to return again. You will not leave, Madam, in any event."

"Trust me to do a mother could. I like your arrangement of going over to the St.John's for a change as soon as she is able."

I buried my face, not only to shut out the sounds, but to conceal my tears. He was going away without speaking to me. Madam Hamilton was cruel.

"Tell me what it is, honey!" Mammy Rose said, detecting my emotion, and smoothing my hair caressingly. "You're weak and tired, poor heart! Tell Mammy."

"Nothing! Nothing!"

"Yes, 'tis something, chile. Tell Mammy Rose."

"It's dreadful to feel alone in the world."

"Yes, that's it, honey! All alone! Mammy knows."

I wept a while, and fell asleep from extreme exhaustion.

The next day Aunty Hamilton told me we were all going to the "Green Cone Spring" as soon as I was strong enough to make the journey by short stages. The air was much more bracing there, she said, than at the lake, and the bathing luxurious. The Springs had been a great resort for invalids before the war, and would be a charming place to summer.

I did not care for the Springs that day. I was disappointed and unhappy.

The devotion of the servants was truly affecting. One by one as I was able to see them they came to speak to me, bringing some little offering of fruit or flowers, and their broken words of congratulation went to my very heart. They vied with each other in efforts to tempt my appetite, bringing me chickens and the rarest wild birds of the marshes. True it is that grandiose and unwilliness abide with the lowly. What can one best offer on the altar of humanity to theirs! Think of an aged slave, toiling in the cotton or cane fields from Monday morning until Saturday night, sacrificing his one day of rest to a stranger—walking long, weary miles to pull cresses from a spring where he had pulled them in long-past days, and did it for me. It is a wonder I wept when these affectionate creatures gathered around to say farewell the morning I left Gainesville, hoping expecting to return in a few months?

There was a carriage-load of us that morning as we drove through the great gate into the public highway—Madam Hamilton, the two little girls, Tilly, and myself in the interior; Tom on the outside, with boxes and carpet-bags filling every inch of space beneath the seats. Fortunately the luggage was strong, or we might have foundered in the sand.

The journey occupied three days, riding a few hours only during the morning, and resting at mid-day. Every day I gained strength with the exercise, until we reached the St. Johns, more beautiful than I had pictured it. The little children were astonished at sight of a noble steamer which passed up the river the evening of our arrival—the first they had ever seen. I was astonished also, not at the steamer, but at the flag she bore—the dear old Flag of the Union—the first which had greeted my sight since leaving Fort Taylor.

"Look! Madam," exclaimed, pointing to the waving banner, "look! Is it possible?"

"Certainly, my dear, the Unionists control the river. Did you not know it? But how should you? The steamer Jacksonville have all taken place since your illness."

"Did Colonel Hamilton know it when he made arrangements for us here?"

"Not when he first proposed it. But as he believed the change of air and scene necessary for you, he would not allow the circumstance to reverse his decision."

"Generous, noble!" I could not help exclaiming. "But, aunty, as much good as the sight of the old Flag does me, is it agreeable to you here?"

"I understand you," she replied. "I am a Philadelphian by birth and education, and have not lived South long enough to learn to love a fragment of my native land better than the whole. It is wisdom, however, to enjoy one's opinion in silence sometimes."

It was the first time any allusion to the existing troubles between the two sections had been made by either of us. She was the widow of Colonel Hamilton's uncle, and had had the care of his motherless childhood. I had heard him speak of her with the affection of a son.

"Does he know your sentiments?" I asked.

"My nephew, I suppose, you mean, dear?" she returned, smiling. "He has always known them, and loves me none the less for them. He is one of the few noble minds who has grasped a prejudice of education and fancies it a principle. He is neither obstinate nor unreasonable, and has none of the selfish ambition of the great secession leaders."

"Is it not singular we have never heard from him since he went away?"

She looked at me inquiringly.

"Ah! the children told you he had been home, did they? Mammy and I tried to keep it a secret."

"No one told me, Madam! I heard his voice, and was grieved that he did not come and speak to me."

"He was grieved that we would not allow him, and left you the tenderest messages. I am sure he would have come to see you, Margy, than he believes. Pray, my dear, that nothing may have befallen him. There has been dreadful fighting recently."

The next day a gun-boat passed up the river—one of those terrible monsters which had wrought such rebel consternation at Hatteras and Port Royal. We sat at the window of the hotel and watched a yawl with a white flag pull out into the current to meet the ship's boat and deliver the papers. At dinner the landlord told us another great battle had been fought in Virginia, and promised to send us both the Union and the Southern reports of it. He believed the Yankees had gained another victory.

Joy for my country's success was not cloudless.

The papers contained the particulars of the battle of Williamsburg. The Northern journals claimed a great victory—the annihilation of the rebel army, and a thousand prisoners. The dead and wounded of the enemy were left on the field because the rebels were too much cut up the body of one rebel Colonel; one General, and half a dozen Colonels and Captains among the wounded.

The Southern papers were as despondent as the Northern ones were jubilant. Calamity was the succeeding calamity. Scarcely was the fall of New Orleans heralded before a train of reverses from the Army of the Potomac—weak hearts to faint, while it only roused the brave to firmer resolve. It was a comfort to know that their troops had fallen back from any fight with overcourage, but from mere weakness and exhaustion, having been cut off from their supplies, and going into battle fasting. Some of them left their best officers were among the dead and wounded. It was impossible to give the list, as the battle-field was in possession of the enemy.

Madam Hamilton read, and I listened calmly.

"We shall get additional details soon," she remarked. "I have no doubt George was in the engagement."

How very impatiently we waited for further particulars! Not a word came from Jacksonville. I suspected she had heard rumors she was unwilling to repeat.

On the return of stood convicted of evil tidings at first glance. Neither of us had courage to ask a question as he appeared before us fumbling in his pockets for a letter, which was at length produced.

"De yer is for you, Missis, from Mason Grin'nal Hughes," he said, handing it to me. "And done gone dead sure, and Mas'r George nowhar to be found. 'Spec Linkum's cotched him."

I broke the open Hamilton read the letter and read, while I gazed upon her like a petrifaction. After she had finished it, she said:

"I wrote to the commanding officer at Jacksonville, asking him for such information as he might possess relative to the recent battle. He writes that Colonel Wood is killed beyond peradventure. Colonel Hamilton was wounded in the right arm in the early part of the engagement, and is at present among the missing, probably a prisoner."

The two little children when they comprehended the nature of the intelligence were heartrending. For a time no one was sufficiently composed to attempt consolation. Madam Hamilton bowed her head over the letter and wept silently. Tom and Tilly caught the children's grief, and added their lamentations.

Hope was ever the ruling element of my nature, and it came to my aid then. Struggling violently to keep down the heart-pain and be calm, I said:

"This is not as bad as it might have been, after all! Mas'r George, darling, is dead, and not killed like some poor children's. He has only got his right arm hurt so he could not write, maybe. Or, if he is a prisoner, he will be exchanged, you know, some day, and sent home. Don't cry any more! When we get the next papers we shall know all about it."

I had confidence in what I said, and succeeded in inspiring not only the children, but Tom and Tilly with the same belief. Aunty Hamilton smiled sadly while encouraging us to look on the bright side. I was certain she did not see it herself.

It was weary waiting for official reports, and when they arrived they contained the name we elicited. Wounded and missing, with a mention of the extreme gallantry with which he led his men into action, was all the record of Colonel Hamilton.

"What do you think now, my dear?" Madam inquired, when we had searched the papers in vain for tidings more explicit.

"That he is one of those half dozen wounded and captured colonels and captains of whom the Northern papers speak. I'm sure he's not killed, or it would be known."

"God grant it! I wish, if living, he were assured of our safety. I know how much he will suffer on our account."

"I will go and relieve him, aunty."

She looked at me, though I had not quite recovered my senses, then smiled faintly as she replied:

"I think he will be most anxious about you, Margy."

All that night I lay sleepless, my head bursting with projects. The next morning, on my way to the Springs, I met Tom, looking a shade darker than usual.

"Look here, Tom; I want to ask you a question or two. Can you keep a secret?"

"Try me, Miss."

"Is it true what Mr. Bates said yesterday, that the darkeys along the river are running away to the gun-boats?"

"Lots on 'em, Miss."

"How do they know when to look for them?"

"One a week goes for to carry coal and visions to be beknowledged up Black Creek."

"When may the next one be expected?"

"Dis yer week, to-morrer."

"Tom, do you know any one who would dare carry a note to the commander?"

"Know nobody, 'cept who is gwine nex' time. Missis, can you keep de secret?"

"You can try me, Tom," I said, imitating his own style.

"Well, den, de berry ole debil's to pay up yer. Massa Cunnel Sumbody down to Jacksonville done hung two niggers and hid 'em in de brush to shoot de gun-boat wid nex' time. I tole ole Hosson's boys de fact, and dey's gwine to 'form de captain of de trap set for him."

"Why didn't you do it yourself, Tom?"

"Dat's it now! You see, Missis, of I'd ben know'd 'bout it myself. Some things isn't counted honable. Mas'r George 'posed confordance in me when he sent me way ober yer to take care for de ladies—he done 'spected I'd."

"De fact is, Sam, sumbody must tell de gunboat. I shall be missed of I go, and 'spected when I come back, 'cause I can't stay in honor. My time isn't 'xactly come."

"Were you not afraid to trust him?"

"We boys is 'spected to trust one anoder. We's all in de berry same boat. I jes' know'd Sam was waitin' to git off. His master's grillar, and grillars isn't counted honable by darkeys, for he's black."

"I will give you a note for him to-day. Go now and tell Tilly to make the young ladies for their bath."

"I think you are a little down-hearted to-day, Margy," Aunty Hamilton said as we sat silently together.

"I have something to tell you, and don't exactly know how to begin. You see I am nearly well now."

"Very much better, my dear, but not well yet. You mustn't speak about the lessons, for George has prohibited them altogether."

"I was thinking of the lessons, aunty; I was wondering if you had any gold."

"A little, my child."

"Well, I have a little too; don't you think together we have enough for a passage money to the North? I think a sea-voyage would complete my cure."

The old lady bestowed upon me another of those questioning glances, and, apparently satisfied, replied:

"I don't wonder you should wish to get home, Margy; and if you had a permit, I would do any thing in my power to help you. You can't engage any power in the so-called Confederacy to obtain one for you, and it is not easy to go. I am going to the gun-boats; but you must not know when nor how, for fear the rebels should learn our movements and stop me. There is another thing I have been thinking about. If Colonel Hamilton is wounded, don't you think he would like to have you with him? I'll give bonds for him if he runs away."

Surprise was written on every feature of Madam Hamilton's face as she spoke.

"Are you certain you have strength and courage for such an enterprise, my dear child? You look like a shadow."

"Courage mounts with occasion, you know. I've never possessed any, I think, because my path has always been smoothed and guarded. Now I must take life as it comes, rough or smooth, and I may as well get myself over as cover."

Here I burst into, laid my head in her lap, and wept.

"Nay, don't say a word to discourage me, aunty; I know what kind friends I have found in you all, and how willingly you would continue to encourage me, as you say; but I have something to do myself now. My father had influential friends. Through their influence I may be able to get Colonel Hamilton exchanged, or set at liberty, and restored to his family. Is it an unwomanly thought?"

She kissed my cheek, and said, fervently,

"My God prosper you, my child!"

The war-steamer passed up the river that night, as Tom had predicted, and would be back within two days. The note was sent, and, at Tom's suggestion, a place appointed for signaling the steamer on her return. The fellow was quite overjoyed at the thought of going with me in search of his master, especially when I told him it was "honorably arranged."

"I will leave my trunks in your care, dear aunty, until I come back for Robert. The carpet-bag and portmanteau will contain every thing I shall need, and Tom can handle them conveniently. Don't fret about me; I will write from Port Royal, and bribe somebody to send you the letter."

All that night Tom watched at the place designated, lest by some mistake the vessel should pass unsignaled. Just after daybreak I heard him tapping at my door.

"Hear 'em gittin' up steam, Miss, round de bend. Be yer in an hour. Don't hurry. Miss de truck's all dar, and Dick Porter got de white cloff all ready to swing. I'll put de saddle on Empress; Dick gwine to fetch um back."

I went to give the children a parting kiss. Tilly was already standing on her blanket beside their bed. Without awakening Ether, I stole back as softly as possible, for fear of disturbing Madam Hamilton. She, I was positive, had slept as little as myself. She heard me, and called softly,

"Come to me, my child! I am afraid I have done wrong, Margy, to countenance you in so bold an undertaking. If any thing should happen, George would never forgive me, any more than I should forgive myself. Do be cautious, my dear. One more kiss."

Empress stood pawing the ground a short distance from the hotel. Two or three of the house servants were astir, and stood watching me as I mounted, evidently surprised at my early ride. We took an opposite direction from the point, but soon turned our course, paths running every way through the pine groves.

The vessel was in sight, rapidly approaching the shore. I did not dismount until the barge was launched and on its way; then, ready to faint with pain, I gave the bridle to Tom's hand to Tom, and a moment after was seated in the little boat along-side the war-steamer.

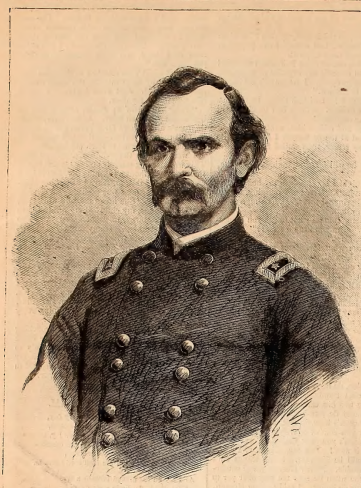
A SOLDIER'S DREAM.

We had marched hard all that weary day,
And sunset was bright in the west,
When all night long on a lonely bed
Our soldier boy took his rest.

And weary and sad was the dream,
As dream in the field ever was,
To wash and rest, or to sleep and dream—
To dream of the loved one's eyes.

Or hear in the wind the shell's wild scream.

As I lay on the ground beneath a tree
That night—my limbs were weary and cold—
I dreamed. In my dream all seemed to be
At peace, and myself grown lame and old;
While a bright-eyed boy sat on my knee,
Begging of me war-dance to be heard.



His bright eyes filled with childish tears,
And his pouting lips parted in pain,
At the tale of woe in those by-gone years,
And the battle-fields strewn with the slain,
But laughed with joy when told of the cheers
That greeted triumphant peace again.

More there was of my vision—much more;
Much more, indeed, of what might have been:
For peaceful memory was free to soar
In realms far away from war and sin;
But a voice rose, only half heard before:
Was repeating—"Third relief—fall in!"

THE CAPTURE OF SAVANNAH.

AFTER having completed his grand march through Georgia, from Atlanta to Savannah, General Sherman's first effort was to communicate with the fleet off Savannah. This he accomplished by the capture of Fort M'Allister, the only serious obstruction to the navigation of the Ogeechee River. The fort was sixteen miles from the mouth of the Savannah. It was also first-class fort ever bombarded by Monitors. It was now, however, taken by direct assault. The party to whom the work was assigned was General Hazen's Division. The defenses of the fort was insignificant in point of number, there being only men enough to man the guns, of which there were fourteen. The assault was most animated. The men marched at double-quick, penetrated the abatis, and, crossing the ditch, scaled the parapets of the first and three minutes the garrison were prisoners. The capture of the fort gave us a large quantity of ordnance stores, guns, ammunition, &c. The fort was taken to the Savannah, masters of the ordnance-officer, Lieutenant SPENCER, near the fort.

Pretty closely investing the city, except at a point on the north side directly across the river, SHERMAN at length determined to make an assault. Previous to this attempt, however, he sent a message to General HARDEE demanding the surrender of the city. The latter assumed a rather defiant attitude and refused. But during the night he slipped across the Savannah on a pontoon with his fifteen thousand men. The movement was soon observed by General GEARY, who immediately pushed his division (the Second of the Twentieth Corps) on into the city. Geary's division was the first by the Mayor and Commonalty of Savannah, who surrendered the city unconditionally. The forts were then taken possession of and their ordnance. The captures included 150 guns, 18 locomotives, and 35,000 bales of cotton. The rebels had destroyed their shipping. The floating battery was sunk. The Savannah, a formidable war vessel, was blown up. When the troops entered the city there was no disorder except a slight one created by released people in the city, who plundered every thing within reach. Even the rebel soldiers had been participating in acts of violence. Order was soon restored, and the next Sabbath the churches were attended as usual. General GEARY has been appointed commander of the city, which is divided into two Departments, the Eastern and Western, commanded respectively by Colonel WOOD and Colonel BARNUM. GEARY took all the Commissary stores which he found in the city and placed them at the disposal of the Mayor and Common Council. It is estimated that 25,000 inhabitants remained in the city. The illustration on the first page shows our troops entering Savannah at sunrise. Colonel BARNES's brigade was the first in town. General SHERMAN's loss, after he invested Savannah, was from six to eight hundred men.

We give on page 24 an illustration of General KILPATRICK's last charge at Waynesborough. There were two fights on the march from Atlanta to Savannah. One was the engagement which WOLCOTT had with the enemy at Griswoldville, November 22, in which the enemy was severely repulsed. The other was General KILPATRICK's affair with WHEELER's cavalry, December 4. KILPATRICK drove WHEELER's corps to a strong rail barricade near Waynesborough, and soon, by a most gallant charge, himself at the head of his command, compelled a retreat, which was continued eight miles beyond Waynesborough. In this battle the sabre was used with brilliant effect.

THE LATE HON. WILLIAM L. DAYTON.

WILLIAM LEWIS DAYTON was born at Baskinridge, New Jersey, February 17, 1807. He was a farmer's son; but at an early period of life acquired an excellent education, graduating at the age of eighteen at the College of New Jersey. He immediately entered upon the profession of law. He became quite intimately connected with political affairs, being associated with the Whig party in his State, and especially with the Free Soil wing of that party. In 1837 he was elected a member of the New Jersey Senate, and was made Chairman of the Judiciary Committee. The following year he was chosen by the Legislature one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of New Jersey, which position he held for three years. Mr. DAYTON in 1842 was appointed United States Senator, to fill a vacancy caused by the death of SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD, and in 1845 was elected for the full term of six years. His position during this Senatorial career of nine years was always positive and decided. He was opposed to slavery on the ground of humanity, and always advocated its abolition in the District of Columbia, and its prohibition in the Territories. He voted for the admission of California as a free State, and in 1850, when schemes of compromise every where prevailed, he voted against the Fugitive Slave Law.

With these associations in his favor he was in 1856 nominated by the Republican party for Vice-President. When Mr. LINCOLN was elected President in 1860, Mr. DAYTON was appointed Minister to France. It is scarcely possible for the people to adequately appreciate the value of his services in this most important mission. A man of weight and principle, and therefore always firm, he gained both respect and confidence at the French Court. Notwithstanding the delicate difficulties of his situation at critical periods during the present war, his correctness and uniform firmness has always carried him safely through. His personal appearance was very fine, and in his manners he was affable and unpretending. His death occasioned the most sincere regret. It occurred in Paris, under peculiarly melancholy circumstances, December 1, 1864. He died suddenly from a fit of apoplexy while at the Hotel du Louvre. The country will have occasion for self-congratulation if our next Minister to France shall be found a statesman as honorable and as judicious as was Mr. DAYTON.

OUR RELEASED PRISONERS AT CHARLESTON.

In previous numbers we have illustrated the reception of our released prisoners off Savannah. The exchange was scarcely half completed at that point when the affair was interrupted, and afterward resumed at Charleston. We give three sketches in this number relating to the exchange at this latter point. It is supposed that Colonel MULFORD is engaged in another effort to renew the exchange. According to rebel authorities there have been confined in Libey Prison at Richmond during the past year 31,000 Federal prisoners. They claim during the war to have had in "Libey" 125,000 men. In our last number we gave illustrations of the prison pen at Millen, where a large number of our prisoners have recently been confined. Late advices from Savannah seem to indicate that SHERMAN'S cavalry has undertaken an expedition to release our prisoners in the South. This rests on the authority of a dispatch from HARDEE, saying that SHERMAN was dispatching a cavalry expedition into Southwestern Georgia.

OUT OF BONDAGE.

OTHERS have told their stories of capture and escape—of adventures by sea and land; will you not listen to mine?

I was captured at Drury's Bluff on the 16th of May last—the day on which, advancing under cover of a heavy fog, the rebels surprised and drove in General Butler's lines, drawn meaningly around Fort Darling. General Heckman, of New Jersey, formerly my commander, was captured on the same day, and we were sent into Richmond together. It had long been my ambition to follow my intrepid leader into the rebel capital, but I had hoped to enter it as a victor, not as a captive; and as we marched along the filthy streets I found little pleasure in contemplating the situation. Meditation, however, was not long tolerated. Very soon we were lodged in front of a large three-story brick building, and, looking, up, we saw this sign, which is so many times used to cover the symbol of unutterable outrage and wrong-doing:

LIBEY AND SON,
SHIP CHANDLERS AND GROCERS.

We knew at a glance what that meant, and what fate was in store for us. Entering one of the main rooms we registered our names, which, being accomplished, the keeper, "Dick" Turner—a man who in Virginia's respectable—intimated that our greenbacks, haversacks, and woolen blankets must be handed over for the use of the Confederacy, and proceeded accordingly to dispossess us of these articles, remarking, however, that the money would be returned to us upon leaving the prison, which of course we did not believe for a moment. Turner's next operation was to strip us and search us closely, after which we were shown to our quarters on the second-floor of the building. There we remained for two weeks, receiving barely sufficient food to maintain life. Only one pint of tea was issued daily to seven of us—all lusty, vigorous lads!; in addition to this we had each one spoonful of tasteless salt per week. For the first ten days we received no meat whatever; then ten pounds of rotten bacon were issued for sixty-two men.

On the last day of May, however, we were delivered from the terrors of the Libey; and with over eleven hundred enlisted men were sent to Macon, Georgia, where we arrived on the 6th of June. Here, where we found a thousand brother officers in confinement, we fared much better so far as rations were concerned, but were compelled for several weeks to lie on the ground in the open air, suffering terribly from the scorching sun by day, and the heavy dews at night. But we were not idle during our confinement. Lovin' and puting for liberty we completed, during the months of June and July, three tunnels with a view to escape—one being slightly feet in length. Unfortunately, however, on the very day preceding the night on which we intended to escape, these tunnels were all discovered and destroyed, and we were placed under a much stricter surveillance in an Illinois cavalry regiment, who, as the reward of his treachery, was ever after treated with great consideration by the rebel officers.

When Sherman, in midsummer, began to penetrate the bowels of Georgia, the rebel authorities, fearing that we might visit Macon and release us, on the 29th of July sent some 600 officers to Savannah, where we remained over a month, being treated with great kindness. Thence, on the 16th of September, we were taken to Charleston, and confined in the jail-yard—as filthy a den as you can find any where south of Richmond. Our life in this place was not by any means without incident and excitement. Almost daily we had "some new thing" to divert our attention. Only the day after our arrival, the shells from our batteries on Morris Island fired a dozen buildings near the jail, which were uninhabited, notwithstanding the assertion of the rebels of the negroes, who now work the "machines" in that city, to stay the progress of the conflagration. Frequently we were in danger from the fragments of exploding shells, but Providence was on our side, and none of us were ever struck. It was a grand thought to us, however, in the hands of a cruel enemy, that our brothers lying out on the harbor-islands were not by any means surely sparing our wrongs, battering down about their ears the homes of the pestilent authors of this wicked rebellion. One day a shell came into the city limits and struck somewhere the way to the Arsenal," but I did not hear that any of the citizens put themselves out of the way to welcome the visitor toward the destination which General Foster's facetious artillerists desired it to reach. We had also a subject for discussion in the vacancy of the yellow-fever, which just then was filling the whole city with consternation. Daily, gathering in groups, we discussed the probabilities of the plague reaching our quarters; and when our guards were seized, and one by one disappeared, you may imagine how our solicitude was quickened. A new face to each of us the Devil became a personal thing, walking beside us every where, flinging a baleful shadow over our very sleep. But, strange to say, although every officer and man who was placed over us died from this disease, not a single prisoner was touched! Was it retribution or was it chance that such a strange thing should happen?

On the 6th of October our prison-life at Charleston came to an end, and we were started on a special train for Columbia, one hundred and thirty miles distant, where a prisoners' camp had been established. But I had, for my part, no desire to remain any longer in banks; I yearned for the free air again, and resolved, then if ever, to make one more dash for freedom. So, as soon as our train had passed the Congaree River, some fifty miles from Columbia, I removed the caps from the guns of the guards—it was dusk at the time—and with Captain A. Grant, Nineteenth Wisconsin Regiment; Captain H. H. Todd, Eighth Iowa Cavalry; and Lieutenant J. E. Lewis, Eleventh Connecticut, leaped from the train, running rapidly into the woods which skirted the road. How our hearts must have throbbed as we found ourselves free! Instinct was certain, and that thought intensified our excitement. By this time the night had grown quite dark, and a heavy rain had begun to fall, pouring with noisy beat among the dripping trees. The train, fortunately, did not stop; but in about two hours we heard, from our shelter in the woods, the deep baying of blood-hounds, warning us that in some way information of our escape had been communicated to the guards. Presently, We at once plunged into a swamp in order to baffle the hounds, and floundered about therein until daylight, when we halted to rest. Being without food for a suitable place to lie down, we leaned against the bushes, maintaining that attitude all day long. It was a sorry time of resting, but we could do no better, and were thankful for even that morsel of comfort. At sunset we came at last to a plantation-house with hickory clubs, we made our way with difficulty out of the swamp, and pushed forward in our flight.

By daylight the following morning we had accomplished a distance of twenty miles, not, however, without experiencing a new alarm from the hounds, which again got on our track. The only hiding a number of small streams we managed to elude our pursuers, and at dawn sought cover in a heavy pine forest, where we remained for rest and refreshment every night for a week. By this time our rations were exhausted, and the question of subsistence became one of the most serious import. With all our efforts we found that nothing could be obtained unless we visited the houses of the white planters, which we were determined not to do, as we knew too well how little sympathy was to be expected in that quarter. As length, in our wanderings, we came to one solitary cabin, and, spurred by appetite, we plucked some corn, which we parched and ate with the greatest relish, notwithstanding it had an insipid taste from having been long cured in the process of mastication. For the next six days our diet consisted solely of hard, dry corn; after that we were reduced to a state of utter destitution, being able to obtain nothing but berries, grapes, persimmons, etc., which we found in the woods and swamps. On the 20th we came to a long unthenticated Government "track," and declaimed against contractors' beef, but now, crouching in those dismal swamps and living on "wild" fare, we would have relished the substantial fare which, in hours of plenty, we had so execrated. But, with all our hardships, we did not for a press on through the soaking days, hiding by day, determined to get into "God's country" again, though we had to go through fire to reach it.

Finally, moving steadily forward, we reached a point about two hundred and fifty miles from Charleston, and one night made our presence known to some negroes at work in a field. We knew they would not betray us, as others will do in a while! Our skin might do upon opportunity. We had no difficulty in persuading them that we were Federal officers—regular Federal officers, for they ordered service; they seemed to look upon us as in some way sufferers for their sake, and they fairly landed on us with "God bless you!" "Glad to see you come;" this was the greeting, the spice that enriched all their homely talk. They procured us food, corn-meal, salt, and directed us minutely as to explicit information as to the best route to the mountains; and when at last we departed ruined shoes and stockings and blankets for the journey. One thing particularly struck us in our intercourse with these dusky sons of toil; they understand perfectly, notwithstanding the misrepresentations of the grand theatres of military operation, the causes and tendencies of the war, and were eager to escape to be to the Union lines. Their doors were ever open to them. They have an almost childish faith in "Massa Linkum," and I think he is richer in their prayers than in all the gold in the world. A kingly and princely ones petitioned Heaven daily, on bended knees, in his behalf.

We pushed on. On the morning, when near Dallas, North Carolina, we accidentally met a white man. Probably you can picture to yourself how we felt and looked when, suddenly, this man stood before us. Was he friend or foe? Necessarily we resorted to conversational strategy, putting and answering questions with the utmost wariness. We were not long in discovering the status of the stranger, and probably he had never been embraced before with the vehemence with which we clasped him to our arms, and that he was a loyalist. He forthwith piloted us two miles through the woods to his house—a rude, humble cabin—and telling his wife and children we had prepared for us a smoking supper, installing us in the place of honor, while he and his family waited upon us with the most respectful attention. That night, sitting before the cheerful blaze of his great hearth, he told us the story of South Carolina Unionism, briefly proving to us that freedom still has brave defenders among the hardy forest-men of the old North State. He said he belonged to a secret society called the "Heroes of America"—a sort of Union League—whose main object was to keep Unionists out of the rebel army. Many, however, had been forced into it, and were members of this order, and they had in more ways than one greatly injured the Confederacy. "And we mean to start 'em the work," he added, "till this cussed rebellion is wiped out clean as my wife's platter. The old Government was good enough for us, and that Lincoln fellow must git in ter it or hang."

That night we slept in the best room—there were but two—and slept soundly and sweetly, for the words of our host had fallen upon us like soothing balm, and it seemed as if we were already on the threshold of home.

On the morrow our friends filled our haversacks with delicious wheat biscuits and other "goodies," and directing us to other Unionists, sent us away with good wishes, standing in the door of their humble home till long after we had been lost in the shadows of the woods. May God ever guard and keep them in that home, sheltered by the pines, among the dreary mountains!

From that time forward we experienced little trouble in finding Union men. They were every where. Soon after crossing the Catawba River we met many deserters from the rebel armies—men who, impressed or driven into the service, had escaped, and now doted like whole power of the rebellion. These men welcomed us with open arms; there was a sort of kinship between us which made us at once fraternize with them. In Caldwell County alone I became associated with hundreds of this class of persons, and had from scores of lips the story of their love for the Union, its griefs and sublime heroism. These men are associated with another class called "buyer-outs," who have been living in caves and other retreats in the mountains, and resisting the rebel conscription through two years of vicissitude and suffering. In all my wanderings I have never seen a more determined set of men. Mingling among them, I thought of the brave defenders of the Tyrol—of the hardy Waldenses, fighting and dying among the rocks for dear liberty's sake. Although but poorly armed—with only old horse-pistols and squirrel-guns as weapons of defense—they still manage to keep at bay all the forces sent against them, and they will continue to do so until some Federal column, marching into the mountains from East Tennessee, shall finally deliver them from the peril which now constantly menaces them. Many of these "buyer-outs" are driven by war in to comfortable circumstances, owning pleasant and profitable farms; but now most of them are, with their families, reduced to a condition of absolute penilless. Some of them, compelled to abandon every thing because of their devotion to the Government and the flag, have for three years concealed their own door-sills, although daily they have seen their homes from their hiding-places in the forests. Wife and children have been exiled in enforced idleness, their brave, true-hearted wives have performed every drudgery, working their little farms, and in addition to the cares of their lives, carrying food to the refugees on the mountains.

We lived with these patriots in their caves for several days, hearing their tales of suffering and the horrible narratives of guerrilla outrages practiced upon defenseless women and children. These human blood-hounds are hunting them now, will often hang children in the hope of extorting a confession as to the whereabouts of their parents. I have known instances where a child died in the same inhuman manner, while wives are often subjected to every cruelty, for no other offense than fidelity to their husbands, fathers, and kindred protectors.

We had but little difficulty in persuading a hundred and more of these loyal North Carolinians to accompany us to the mountains, where we promised to use our influence in procuring them arms, clothing, etc. Without any hesitation they bade their wives and children farewell, and followed us in a body.

Their wives would pray for them, they said; and, if they could only procure arms and ammunition, how they would help to protect their homes, and put an end forever to rebel atrocities on the mountains. How their weather-beaten faces glowed under the inspiring thought! How the little bands of thin-faced children clung around the necks of these brave mountaineers in the solemn parting! and with what fervor were their prayer wives that we might be successful in organizing and arming the battalion. For their sakes we rejoice that we were successful. At Crab Orchard, East Tennessee, we met Major E. A. Davis and Lieutenant James Hartley, belonging to Kirk's Third North Carolina Mounted Infantry. To them we explained our wishes, and at once our daring fellows were sworn into the Federal service, Major Davis telling them that as soon as he could march to Knoxville, and obtain arms and necessary equipments, he would return to their head, and "wipe out" every rebel from "old Caldwell." There, with mutual good wishes, we parted from the noble fellows who had volunteered at upon our way—we feeling that their day of vengeance was near at hand—they happy in the thought that they were under the ally flag, and could henceforth fight in the light of its stars for Unity and Freedom.

From Crab Orchard we moved toward Bull Gap, expecting to find ourselves in possession of that important pass. But upon reaching the top of a mountain overlooking the valley, we were surprised to hear the cannonading and musketry. From a cavalry a number of women, who had been down to reconnoitre, returned with the information that Breckinridge in force was at Bull Gap with four thousand men, and that it would be impossible to get into our lines at that point. Accordingly we determined to move westward to Knoxville, about sixty miles distant. On the evening of November 1st we reached that place, having in just six weeks accomplished a distance of two hundred miles. For more than half that distance Lieut. Lewis and myself marched in nearly a barefooted condition—a portion of the way entirely without shoes or other incline of snow.

So our pilgrimage ended.

Shall I tell you with what exultant satisfaction we reiterated to the loyal mustering company who welcomed us at Knoxville the story of our sufferings and escape—how they cheered us by kindly offices—how thoughts of an old-fashioned Thanksgiving, with the dear ones at home, that night made our dreams luminous as with the smiles of angels? No, you can imagine it all, and if you have ever been in such peril as we had escaped, you will understand what I mean by the sense of exultation which filled those first hours of deliverance, like a resurrection, in which we stood with crowns upon our heads, and shining garments about our shoulders, and everything away in reaches of splendor before our every feet.

Rested at length from our fatigue, under orders from General Carter, Provost Marshal at Knoxville, to report to the Adjutant-General at Washington, we parted from the friends whose tender nursing we shall never forget, and a week afterward—two days after Thanksgiving—felt the kisses of loved ones on our lips—loved ones who had expected never to see us again this side of that river which all of us must ford at the roll-call from above.

In consequence of the great stagnation of trade in the manufacturing districts of England, though the war having cut off the supply of cotton, a large quantity of valuable manufactured goods recently intended for that country, has been sent off for sale in this country, and MUST BE SOLD AT ONCE, REGARDLESS OF COST!

Under these circumstances, ARRANDALE & CO., actuated by a desire to benefit the industrious manufacturer, have received upon a Great Gift Distribution, subject to the following conditions:

CERTIFICATES, naming each article and its value, are first placed in envelopes, sealed, and well mixed. One of these envelopes will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of 25 cents.

ALL ARTICLES SOLD AT ONE DOLLAR EACH,
WITHOUT REGARD TO VALUE!

On receipt of the Certificate you will see what you are going to have, and then it is at your option to send the Dollar and have the article sent, or to exchange it and obtain a Gold Watch, Diamond Ring, or any Set of Jewelry worth FIVE DOLLARS, instead. In this way you can they get less than One Dollar's worth, as there are no blanks—Every Certificate draws a Present.

One for 25 cents; five for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10; one hundred for $15.

Agents will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate sold. Circulars containing full information sent to you Dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, which will be returned in postage stamps.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
FOR JANUARY, 1865.

Important to Subscribers.

Subscribers to the MAGAZINE and WEEKLY will find the Label upon their paper a Receipt for Payment of Account. The figures on the direction-label, following the name, indicate the time to which the subscription EXPIRES, as related on our books. Every Subscriber may thus ascertain whether he has received the proper credit for his remittances, and also when to renew his Subscription. In remitting, Subscribers should always see particularly requested to name the NUMBER with which the Subscription commenced, as sometimes they will thus avoid receiving duplicates, or missing any Number. It is desirable that the renewal should be made a few weeks BEFORE the expiration of the former Subscription, in order that our books may be regularly posted. Attention to this will obviate nine-tenths of the errors which annoy both Publishers and Subscribers.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year $4 00
An Extra Copy, gratis, for every CLUB of FIVE Subscribers at $3 00 each; or Copies for $20 00.

ROYAL VICTORIA HOTEL.
This Hotel, situated at NASSAU, NEW PROVIDENCE, BAHAMAS, was built by the Colonial Government, and is a handsome three-story building, erected on an elevation a few minutes' walk from the shore, and commanding a fine view of the ocean, harbor, and town of Nassau.
Surrounding the Hotel is a piazza ten feet wide, from which the inmates can at all times enjoy the gentle, soothing, easterly trade-winds. INVALIDS unable to bear much fatigue will have a promenade extending one thousand feet, without going from the house. All of the TROPICAL FRUITS grow in great abundance, and are in season the entire winter.
But little rain falls from the month of October to the first of June. THIS IS CONSIDERED THE PECULIAR SEASON FOR INVALIDS, though they can make the entire year with comfort and safety. The roads are macadamized, and kept in good order. A most BEAUTIFUL DRIVE extends for twelve miles along the sea shore. In fact, every thing combines to make it a pleasant home for the robust as well as for the invalid.
The Lessee of the Hotel has recently rented the services of Mr. James Carroll, late of the "NEW YORK HOTEL," and has taken the entire superintendence, and is determined to do all in his power to minister to the wants and comforts of his guests.
The CULINARY and other departments shall be well supplied, the cooks the best obtainable, and the servants attentive and unobtrusive.
The CUNARD CO.'S STEAM-SHIP CORSICA leaves the wharf at Jersey City and New York once a month for NASSAU. The fare to Nassau is forty-five dollars. The charges for board are Three Dollars (3) per day.
Carriages and horses for the Hotel can be had at reasonable rates.
GEO. O. JOHNSON, Lessee.

TESTIMONIAL FROM THE MOST DISTINGUISHED ARTISTS
To STEINWAY & SONS.
New York, December, 1864.
The Piano Forte, Grand, Square and Upright, manufactured by Messrs. Steinway & Sons, have established for themselves a world-wide fame, a reputation that it is hardly possible for us to add any thing to their just fame. Having thoroughly tested and their instruments personally for years, both in public and private, it becomes our pleasant duty to express our opinion regarding their unquestioned superiority over any other piano known to us.
Among the chief points of their uniform excellence are: Greatest possible depth, richness, and volume of tone, with brilliancy, a most delicate, responsive, and perfect evenness throughout the entire scale, and above all a surprising durability, which stands as a most remarkable quality of which never changes under the most delicate or powerful touch. These qualities are found exclusively in the Steinway Piano, and together with the matchless precision of action, and the beautiful and entirely new characteristics those instruments, as well as their unequaled durability under the severest trials, is truly surprising, and claims at once the admiration of every artist. We, therefore, consider the Steinway Piano in all respects to be by far the best instruments made in this country or Europe, we them solely and exclusively ourselves, in public or private, and recommend them invariably to our friends and the public.
We have at different times expressed our opinion regarding the pianos of various makers, but freely and unhesitatingly pronounce Messrs. Steinway & Sons' Pianos, both grand and square, incomparably superior to them all.

SAINT MARTIN AND THE BEGGAR.

BY N. G. SHEPHERD.

HOLY Saint Martin rides at Amiens' gate,
Passing that way where went both low and great,
Saw there, shiver with the winter's cold,
A poor half-naked wretch—river or gold
The Saint had none! his kindly beaming eyes,
Mild as the light of stars within the skies,
Filled with the rising glory in his heart,
Where dwelt all charities which make men blest.
At sight of one, a soul so desolate,
Homeless and friendless by the city's gate,
And taking from his back the coat he wore,
Into two parts the garment then he tore,
And with a blessing which all lips may say,
Gave to him nearest the half, and went his way.

NEXT night, upon some dead of merry best,
By that same gate the good Saint Martin went,
And saw within its shadow, standing there,
A man of thoughtful mien and presence fair.
Around whom shone a mildly radiant light—
None like to it had ever blest his sight—
And in its shen the city's frowning gate
Seemed Heaven's own portal where good angels wait,
And to the Saint's meek eyes, with wonder wide.
The palms of Paradise upros each side;
And lo! the man was Christ! speechless, amazed,
Spell-bound with wonderment Saint Martin gazed,
And saw the ragged garment he had given
Worn on the shoulders of the Lord from heaven!

STATE SOVEREIGNTY.

DURING the progress of the war and the desolation of the Southern States the tragical sophistry of the theory of supreme State Sovereignty must have been brought home to many thoughtful minds with overpowering force. It is a theory invented by those who were hostile to the Union, and carefully cultivated by those who meant to try to destroy the nation the moment they ceased to control it. But experience has now shown its practical folly; for it appears that the sentiment of nationality is so much stronger in the country than that of local independence that the opposition is virtually crushed. The instincts of the people of the United States have determined that, as in every political society there can be but one supreme and sovereign power, that authority in this country is the National Government. States, counties, cities, towns, villages, have each their rights and privileges; but among these the claim of asserting an independent supreme sovereignty is not included; and the people have shown that they will maintain the national independence at any whatever. Equal civil liberty in this country is not so much endangered by centralization—bad as extreme centralization may be—as it is by separation. The enemies of equal civil liberty in the United States have always been the advocates of supreme State Sovereignty; but its friends have always seen that the truest defence of liberty is confidence in the people as a whole, and not in the State divisions.

Indeed the idea that Iowa, Minnesota, or Wisconsin, arbitrarily measured off from the territory of the United States by the authority of the United States, and settled by New Englanders, New Yorkers, Pennsylvanians, and various Europeans, is a sovereign State independent of all others, and, at its pleasure, utterly foreign to the United States, is sheer midsummer madness. A wind in the clouds of the New York or Chicago has just as much original sovereignty independent of the city as such a State has of the people of it.

Nor is the case really different with what are called the original States. They were generally tracts granted to companies under royal patents. Their boundaries were expressed with amazing vagueness. The original colonists were mainly from England. They brought with them a nationality and national forms of local government. They were not originally sovereign nor independent; but as united colonies they won a united independence, and established a united government which they found too weak, because it left the union subject to the individual control of the States. Thereupon the Union was formed, if does not a league—is was not a treaty—it was not a confederation; and the necessities and instincts of the people have approved the intention of its wisest friends, showing it to be in the truest sense a nation. The war proves how deep and strong the national instinct is; and it is impossible that the great truth should not be seen by many a citizen of the Southern States who has hitherto held to the hopeless and impracticable dogma of State Sovereignty.

MORE RAILWAY MURDERS.

IF the people who live along the line of the Erie and other railroads, and who daily go and come through the Bergen tunnel, propose to suffer themselves to be slaughtered like sheep in that dark den, they will undoubtedly meet that fate. But those who have a remoter interest in the matter, who are only generally concerned that railroad travel shall not be certain massacre, have the right to ask of the officers of the Erie Railway, who owned the tunnel, of Messrs. ROBERT H. BERDELL, CHARLES MINOT, J. W. GUPPY, WM. R. FARR, and H. HOBBS, who are named in the Guide as President and General and Assistant Superintendents, why it is that in an unlighted tunnel, 1400 feet long, and through which about a hundred trains pass every day, such precautions are not taken as to render accidents virtually impossible? If the managers of the road can not devise such precautions, they ought not to be intrusted with so immense a responsibility, and are morally guilty of all the horrible consequences.

The only measures upon which the management rely for the safety of the trains are a temporary stoppage before entering the tunnel, a delay of five minutes in allowing another train, and colored lanterns and torpedoes for warning. There are no lights in the tunnel, no signal-men. Any engineer who had daylight darkness should leave all hope behind, conscious as he is that in certain chances which are most likely to occur, he is sure to be a victim. For instance, last week a train stopped in the tunnel just before emerging. As it started the coupling broke. The colored lantern was hung in the rear, and torpedoes were placed upon the track; but the train that followed neither saw nor heard, and came thundering on, with the inevitable result.

That result will constantly repeat itself if the passengers do not help themselves. The loss of life upon railroads during the last year is more than double what it was for several previous years; and the hope of escaping the increasing mortality does not rest with the managers, but with the passengers and the legislature. We hope that in every city and village and Senate the Central Railroad of this State will be firmly met when it comes to ask for additional privileges, and that they will be granted only upon the most stringent conditions, securing the safety and comfort of the public, and upon the clearest showing that the public welfare demands additional grants. The lives and the people of the State of New York not as precious as the dividends of the railroads? Those people will have a right to be disappointed if their representatives do not defend them from the dangers of railroad travel.

THE SIGNS AT SAVANNAH.

IN the late article of the Richmond Sentinel, which sounds like a cry of rage and despair, and which is important because the paper is known to speak the views of President DAVIS, are these words: "If an unpropitious Providence should condemn us to a master, let it not be a Yankee master. Of all the people on earth we have most reason to hate the Yankee race. Any terms by any other would be preferable to subjugation by them."

This is the cry of DAVIS. "I would rather fraternize with hyenas than Yankees." The article, indeed, has the sullen tone of all his speeches. It reveals the gloomy desperation which finds that one hope remains—success or else a final effort, and that is to tell the whole terrible truth. We read no longer that the independence of "the contest" is virtually accomplished. We hear no more the loud boast that one "Southron" will eat up twenty Yankees and rise hungry. We see now the alternative of the dread issue—failure openly proclaimed, with the full consciousness of the writer that if that fails there is an end of hope.

But the assumption of the article in the Sentinel, of a united people, and every citizen the sublime inspiration of a great purpose, is utterly exposed by the conduct of the citizens of Savannah, as well as by the fate of the interior of Georgia. The tone of the Savannah meeting is that of men who have resisted the authority of their Government, and have learned that resistance is hopeless. They therefore lay down their arms, and submit every question to the decision of the constitutional tribunal. They have perfectly well learned what the President DAVIS knows—that the talk about Yankee masters is pure folly. The Government to whose authority they submit they know to be a Government of equal laws, by which every citizen has the same interest and the same power.

The proposal of the Richmond papers to return to colonial dependence upon England, France, or Spain is one that springs from the insanity of chagrin and bad baffled ambition. What have the citizens of Georgia, for instance, to gain by passing from their present power if it were possible? If they had suffered some intolerable outrage for which there was no hope of redress—if they had before them only a vista of hopeless tyranny—if any vital right of theirs were threatened—it is conceivable that they should close their eyes to every thing but separation, even at the risk of ruin, desolation, and ruin. But the people of Georgia "seceded," as they called it, in virtue of what they declared to be a constitutional right. Yet it by no means follows that, because they thought they had better try to set up for themselves rather than remain in the Union, they would therefore consider any kind of political relation with the monarchies of Europe preferable to the Union at home.

And so, in the case of the Savannah meeting, it has proved. The people at that meeting, having found that they can not maintain their theory of the Union, yield to the armed force of the other theory. It is in vain to argue; there is the fact. It is in vain for the Sentinel to assume that the hate of Yankees is the overpowering passion of all those who have been concerned in the rebellion; for there is the Savannah meeting, which is just as much a fact as LEE's army at Richmond. And there is the conduct of the Georgians during SHERMAN's march. If they had chosen they could have destroyed him. But they did not choose. The rebel papers hailed for a general hunt, in which every man was to take part. But the cry had no more meaning or effect than the present shout that any master is better than the Yankees. Such facts show, not that the people of the Southern States or the country have become suddenly warmly patriotic, but that they are men still; that they yield to inevitable laws, and that entire as the one we are considering in the Sentinel, do not fairly represent the universal sentiment.

They show more. They show under what a savage despotism a large number of American citizens in the Southern States have been lying. A fierce and unscrupulous oligarchy has imposed its will by force upon those States, as for many years it did upon the people of the United States. But these last finally spurned the tyranny and threw it off, and the example will be followed in the part of the country where the despotism has been latterly most terrible: that in New Orleans, and Vicksburg, and Nashville, there has been so little expression of loyalty to the Government must be in large part ascribed to the fear that those places would be recovered again by the rebels. But SHERMAN's grasp of Savannah is a sure grasp. The inhabitants feel it. They do not believe the Government will relax that hold, and therefore they speak out.

We need not be deceived. We need not count the meeting for more than it is worth. But it is enough to show that there are some people at the South who are more willing to submit to the "cruel control" of an equal National Government than to "die in the last ditch" to destroy it.

UNION FEELING TOWARD THE REBELS.

THAT the people of Savannah should be starving is remarkable; but even more remarkable, until SHERMAN's arrival, there had been unchecked communication between the city and the fertile belt of Georgia through which the General made his agreeable journey. But if our friends there are really suffering, there is no loyal man in the country who will not wish that they shall be relieved immediately. On the other hand, there can be no opposition to support rebels or rebel sympathizers.

Neither should there be any mawkish misunderstanding of the meaning of "unconditional." The loyal citizens of this country have no disposition whatever to "conciliate" rebels in arms against the common Government. They wish only that the rebellion shall cease. They resistless and unquestionable power of that Government. But if it yields without fighting so much the better. No loyal man wishes unnecessary bloodshed. We should all gladly know that the last gun had been fired. But we do not propose to buy off any body from firing. If the rebels stop because they see resistance is hopeless they will be wise men; they will save themselves and us much suffering. But they ought to have learned that they dread fully mistake if they suppose that they are to be "conciliated" to stop.

Yet they ought also to understand that there is no vindictive feeling in the hearts of Union men. Those who have been the personal fees ing upon our part in this war. Probably there was never a civil contest in which one side was so passionless; but the very want of passion has made the growing exultation more impressive. When the war began there was a very general feeling that it was to be short. There were various extraordinary plans of "conquering" our rebellious countrymen. The early orders of some of our Generals read like pure folly in the light of greater knowledge. We all gradually came to understand how vital the struggle was. Every nerve was strained. Immense armaments by sea and land have been raised. For more than three years the people have only war. Armies six vast expenditures of time and money and life, the country is only the more inflexibly determined. But there is no more wish of revenge than there was in the beginning. There is but one desire in the hearts of loyal men, and that is, a peace which shall be secure and permanent.

Let us hope then that no step will be taken which will lead armed rebels to suppose that our purpose is altered, and that we hope to obtain by fraternity what we can not carry by bullets. Our conduct should be such as to undercive, on the one hand, those who have been taught that we are robbers, murderers, and barbarians; and, upon the other, those who have insisted that we were mean peddlers and cowardly scrubs, who were born to lick the boots of gentlemanly slaveholders, and who would willingly sell our cheap souls for two cents. Among the rebels there are both these classes, and both must be taught the truth.

They could have no better teacher than General SHERMAN. He is an inflexible soldier, but a perfectly reasonable man. He will be neither tyrannical nor weak. The insurgents will see typified in him the resolution of the nation. If there is any need of food for faithful citizens in the Department, he will take care that we know it and that they receive it; and all relief truly required will be most generously and heartily furnished by the loyal people of the country.

GEN. SHERMAN'S "THOUSAND SLAVES."

AMONG the most amusing of the late stories in the Richmond papers is that of the Dispatch, which quotes another paper's account of a conversation between General SHERMAN and "a perfectly reliable gentleman," in which the General declared his belief in the immortality of slavery, and his expectation of owning a thousand slaves after the war. The Dispatch thereupon proceeds to argue that the only result of the war is to be a change of masters for the slaves, by which the slaves, for whom its liveliest sympathies are excited, are to be the saddest sufferers. The hapless negroes are to fall "into the hands of men who do not understand them; who have no real sympathy with them." The happy landlord is to be deprived of that perfect understanding of their natures which imbrutes them and steals their wages, and that real sympathy which wipes their wives and sells their children!

It seems that there has been a curious misunderstanding of the war. It was not begun because the Yankees insisted upon emancipating slavery out of the Territories; or refused to return fugitive slaves; or passed liberty bills; or threatened the perpetuity of the system; but only because the Yankees had a jealousy of the peculiar pleasures of slavery that the Yankees were determined to appropriate to their own use slaves and slaveholders together! That is the truth is, thinks the Dispatch, that Mr. LINCOLN, who declared that the Union could not permanently exist half slave and half free, was envious of Mr. JEFFERSON DAVIS's happiness and prosperity derived from his human cattle, and has therefore undertaken a vast crusade to compel the Union to be wholly and forever dissolved by slaveholding.

That, of course, explains General SHERMAN's remark. He has been signally successful in extending the area of slavery by force of arms. He has marched through Georgia, destroying chains, and, of course, branding his future property. But with characteristic moderation he only means to keep a thousand slaves for his own share. Doubtless he will have one of each that the poor fellows have fallen into the hands of one who "does not understand them," by seizing upon some of those who escaped to him to Savannah and insisting upon their being paid fair wages. He will now show them how a Yankee soldier keeps his word. He will teach that victim whom he has freed by his march to sigh for the picklings and paddlings and slow fires of those who have "real sympathy with them."

The Richmond Dispatch is an extremely sagacious journal. We proffer it a respectful expression of profound sympathy that the divine right of slaveholders "institutions" has fallen to the sacrilegious hands of SHERMAN and his Yankees.

GENERAL CIALDINI'S SPEECH.

A VERY remarkable speech was lately delivered in the Italian Senate by General CIALDINI, an old liberal of 1831, who has long sat silent in his place, and who has bold enough to get up in the Senate, when it was the personal fear of his popular favor he took his seat in the Chambers in his red shirt, "Your red shirt is an insult to the Legislature."

CIALDINI's speech was upon the question of the removal of the capital of Italy from Turin to Florence, and seems to have carried the measure perfectly with the Italian people. His point of view was strictly military, and begins with the statement that there is a powerful enemy permanently established in one of the most important positions. War is therefore inevitable with Austria. Meanwhile peace with France is precarious. The French tradition is to occupy the valley of Italy, and whoever are masters of Mt. Cenis. The cession of Savoy and Nice make Turin no longer safe as the Italian capital. Now, the great natural defenses of Italy are the two slopes of the Apennines, and the valley of the Po must be always the battle-ground. All the military resources of Italy should therefore be gathered at some point between the two seas and behind the mountains. Then, if she loses a battle in the valley, she falls back through the mountains, while there but eight passes, and there recuperating and drawing up the reserves from all the peninsula, she defends the passes and presently pours forth again into the valley. But if the capital is retained at Turin, a foreign victory in the valley secures the capital. "The valley of the Po means the enemy dwelling in your houses, with the door wide open for him to enter at his pleasure."

The speech is striking for its picturesque eloquence, and for its profound romantic feeling.

"Let foreign writers say that Italy is the land of the dead. Yes; but the dead have at last risen from their tombs in the shape of 250,000 armed men, and of 200 battalions of mobolized national guards. The dead have strong and well-manned fortresses to defend their fatherland; they have a fleet to assert their rights over the waters of their national seas. Those very Italians of whom it was said, 'They do not fight,' have already won many battles, have conquered their own sympathies of the royal soldier, or under the red shirt of the volunteer, have taught the illustrious General, who in a moment of an humor uttered those words, that they know how to fight and conquer."

When it is remembered that this dead Italy has produced the most successful statesman and the most successful popular leader of our times, and has shown, despite its overwhelming disadvantages, that it can wisely unite for a common national purpose and exhaust, the huge thing CAVOUR cherished seems only reasonable. A people with MAZZINI to awaken, CAVOUR and CIALDINI to organize, and GARIBALDI to lead, can not be called a dead nation. The human heart every where cries Amen to CIALDINI's noble concluding words: "The school of sacrifice makes the soul of a people stronger." FRANCHERES had the power of making a man out of clay; sacrifice alone has the power of turning men into heroes."

That is the lesson we are learning; and it is not the least inspiring consolation in our struggle to know that, as the true cause of this country has the support of the wiser England, so it is cheered and supported by the faith of the better Italy. CAVOUR, who died in the dark day of our war, always understood it; and it is not for the living Italy, or Italy in the new nation, to VICTOR EMANUEL, CIALDINI, and GARIBALDI that the rebel emissaries address themselves; it is natural and instinctively to the dark and dead Italy, whose shaking sent is at Rome.

THE DOCTORS AND THE SOLDIERS.

It is the duty of the examining physician to declare recruits sound or unsound. If the ranks are swelled with idiots, blind men, paralytics, and other disqualified persons, the fault is prima facie that of the physician, and it is for him to show that his decision against them has been overruled. Collision between the physician and the broker, or the marshal, or the Board, is so easy, and may often be so profitable, that it is obvious the extremest care should be taken to select the most worthy and reasonable medical men.

In one case known to us the physician was at least a rebel. Of course the unsounder the soldier the more the doctor was pleased. His representation of the facts he was removed; but it shows how essential it is that the character and sentiments of this important officer shall be fully understood. It is idle to accuse the Government of the results of our own carelessness; the surgeons can not be personally known to the authorities. There must be appointed upon the representation of the residents of the district. If they do their duty, the Government will do its duty. If they fail, the Government is not responsible.

LITERARY.

"Moods," by LOUISA M. ALCOTT (LORING, Boston). This is a short story of great power and absorbing interest in every where, whose "Hospital Sketches" were remarkable for a humor and insight which ought to have made them much more widely known. In "Moods" the old conflict of passion and noble characters is drawn with great delicacy and skill, and with a freedom and firmness which promise remarkable novels hereafter. "Moods" is neither sentimental nor morbid nor extravagant. It has freshness and life. Further study, more confidence and resolute study will correct the imperfect literary art; nor is it a disheartening failure not to have succeeded in a satisfactory dissection between the two heroes of the tale. Such likeness in unlikeness demands a Shakespearian subtlety of skill fully to paint. It is something to have suggested it. After Hawthorne no recall no American love-story of equal power.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE SITUATION.

ADAM there is a lull. Federal armies are resting, in the mean while making preparations to strike. Rebel armies are retreating upon more interior lines, and preparing to ward off the threatened blows. Our campaigns are getting to be more decisive than they ever have been. They are also getting to be more brief. Sherman's campaign gave us Savannah for Atlanta, and witnessed the progress and overthrow of the conspiracy of Tennessee and Georgia. The country is now asking two questions—which the rebels are asking us—viz: Shall Sherman join Grant? Let us betting with anxious solicitude: What will Thomas now do with the army of ever forty thousand men of which will Sherman next accomplish with his army of sixty-two thousand—an army as invulnerable as any in the world?

And first for General Thomas. That officer stands relatively to the resistance now offered to his advance in a position far more advantageous than that occupied by General Sherman last May. In the first place, because of what Sherman's Atlantic campaign has already accomplished in his behalf. There is a popular impression that because Atlanta has been left behind, the value of Sherman's conquest has been canceled. Not so. Atlanta was important as a depot of supplies, as a great arsenal, as the centre of the great railroad system connecting the Atlantic with the Gulf States. As an attack by land it has been destroyed. As a railroad centre its value has been canceled by the actual destruction of the railroads emerging from it eastward and northward. As soon as Sherman had finished his work there, he was ready to destroy the railroad running southwestwardly from that city toward Florida. This operation having accomplished its object, an equally destructive raid will sever Charleston from its connection with Augusta, and from the entire Atlanta system of railroads will be annihilated. The military scheme of General Thomas's campaign is therefore very greatly limited by Sherman's success, being confined to the Mobile railway with its two central capitals at Meridian and Jackson. But even here a great part of his work has already been done for him by Grant, Davidson, and Dana. In the second place, Thomas has an immeasurably greater force than Sherman had in respect of comparative strength. The rebel General Johnston, before the rebel political party, secretly in the ranks, was compelled to retreat before Sherman's army, with a force of not more than 60,000 men. Hood, who has been demoralized by defeat, and who have just escaped annihilation, has with him an army which can not be counted as a man's fingers. Such a force is not likely to offer any very formidable resistance, and its retreat can not last long.

As to Sherman's next campaign, we are left to conjecture—in respect to details. But it is certain that his present object is the destruction of the remaining system of railway communications upon which General Lee depends. In this respect Sherman's cause triumphs over subsequent movements will be co-operative with General Thomas. The great object of the latter's campaign is to await in Richmond the progress of these movements. Sherman moving northward from Savannah will threaten Lee's communications seriously than does Grant at City Point. The investment of the rebel capital has been begun from a two directions, but the rebel communications still pass every one of the way to the east. He must attend to Sherman, or Sherman will attend to him. Sherman's force is a great army. If it is to be met at all, and with any hope of retaining the capital, it must be met by a force of equal force. This necessity will in a few days transform every battle of Lee's defensive campaign into a battle for the life of Richmond is not given up entirely, yet its defense must be so modified as to be a mere incident of Sherman's distributions. The greater portion of Lee's army is needed further south. We could witness without surprise Thomas monthe military developments, shiftings of position, and strategic combinations among the Gulf States which have already inaugurated the winter campaign.

CONGRESS.

January 5:

In the Senate, a communication was received from the Secretary of War, inclosing General Herron's report on the condition of military affairs in Arkansas was not yet ready. A communication was received from the President announced the readiness of the Coast Survey Report for 1864, and also copies of the correspondence with Great Britain relative. A resolution was adopted directing the Secretary of War to give information in regard to the number of enlistment that had been credited to the respective States, and the principles upon which the credits were given; also a resolution of inquiry into expediency of distributing the extra compensation for enlistments among the soldiers engaged in the capture, upon the principle regulating the distribution of naval prize money. A bill to regulate pension fees was passed. Mr. Wilson's joint resolution declaring the thanks of Congress to Major-General Sherman was under consideration when the Senate adjourned.

In the House, a communication was received from the Secretary of War, transmitting the report of Brevet-Major-General Meigs, relative to the construction of the Capitol extension, covering the ground of the recommendations made in the annual report communicated to House. He hoped that the proposition for this amendment would be voted down. It was a bill to pay a claim that he had no such hope, and even if it did pass it would be a long time before it would become a law. The bill, as it then themselves had been fixed—why not free them further? Mr. Ashley, of Ohio, moved to take up the joint resolution of Congress, under the Constitution, to act in the matter. Also the question of ability to amend the bill at this time when we are in a state of war wherever the Congress of the United States shall deem amendments necessary. He took the ground that Congress had no power to free the negro whatever in any State. He took the view that the principle of international law that if a slave be captured upon his lawful owner by public enemy, the title to the owner could be taken from the possession of the other belligerent. He never will recognize the right of Congress to that a call had just been made for 300,000 more troops. Encouragement of every kind should be given to the volunteer. It was, he said, a sufficient reason to enfranchise the negro voluntarily. The resolution was voted in need of his service, and of his best service, which he could only be secured so long as he was a freeman. Every argument in favor of his enfranchisement also demanded the enfranchisement of his wife. Mr. Ashley became practical necessity for doing it, and the same unanimity which had carried the measure through the Congress hinged for months on the question whether the bill and children of the negro soldier should be also declared to freedom." The question of reference was decided in the negative. Mr. Ashley's bill will therefore receive further consideration of the subject was postponed.

In the House, a resolution was adopted calling upon the Secretary of the Navy to communicate the number of guns and in the ships-of-war constructed by the Navy since its inception, and for what cause; also the number of killed and wounded. A joint resolution was offered, providing that no vacancies in the clerical force in the several departments shall be filled by such disabled soldiers and sailors as shall be discharged from the service on account of injury to the appointment of naval credits was adopted.

January 6:

In the Senate, the House resolution dropping from the Army List all officers convicted either by court-martial or civil tribunals of disloyal practices. A resolution of thanks to Sherman and his army was passed. The same resolution was the same day passed in the House.

In the House, a bill was to bring debate on the proposed amendment of the Constitution.

January 7:

The Senate was not in session.

In the House, the remainder of the session was consumed in the debate on the proposed amendment to the Constitution.

January 9:

In the Senate, after an animated debate, the resolution to free the families of colored soldiers was lost.

In the House, the debate on the proposed amendment of the Constitution was resumed by Messrs. Brooks, Kentucky, and Mr. Odell, of New York, both Democrats, took strong ground in favor of the amendment.

GENERAL HOOD'S RETREAT.

General Hood has Forrest to thank for the escape of his defeated army to the south side of the Tennessee River. When Sherman divided his grand army, he not only left to Thomas an inferior infantry force as compared to his own, but he also took the best part of the cavalry force. Thus, it is true, Thomas was left with a large force. Whether to intercept Sherman's march, but still he had not a force sufficiently powerful, when the troops belonging to the mounted infantry-men, to have numbered from eight to ten thousand men as cavalry, being inferior in numbers, were much superior in discipline. Forrest is an able leader, but unmounted infantry do not answer well the purposes either of infantry or of cavalry in actual engagements. Hood, therefore, was thus relieved largely from from complete destruction, by covering its retreat from Duck River.

The battle of Nashville was fought on the 15th and 16th of December. The next day Forrest made a stand at Spring Hill, to cover the passage of the rebel wagon-train across Duck River. That was the last serious fight of the campaign. After once crossing that stream, Hood's army took a route for Thomas's point of line. Its force had no other disadvantages. He had to build roads as he went along for his wagon-trains, and he had to follow over a tract of country difficult enough of passage for the rebel army. On the 27th of December, the advance-guard after Steedman was cast to Decatur to cut off Hood's retreat. On the 28th, Hood's rear-guard, according to the latest reports, his cavalry had captured and burned Hood's pontoon train, which consisted of from 600 and 700 wagons and 200 hogs. Hood crossed the Tennessee on the 23d at Bainbridge, Alabama, with an effective force, all told, of 30,000 men.

Thomas's first campaign is now at an end. The Federal loss during the campaign has been seven thousand. The rebel loss in killed and in wounded 23,000, and in prisoners 9,384—total, 30,384. Sixty-eight cannon have been captured from Hood, and nineteen rebel generals placed hors du combat.

THE EXPEDITION OF THE ROANOKE.

We reproduce on page 44 a sketch showing the wreck of the Otsego and the exploision of the Sassiya.

The expedition left Hampton Roads December 2. The following vessels were comprised in the naval division: the Wyalusing, Chicopee, Valley City, Belle, Pickett, Lamont, Otsego, Delaware, the Sassiya, and the Shawsheen. A battery under Colonel Terrable started the same day.

The expedition was a success from that night. It was just above this point that the Otsego was blown up, by the ignition of her magazine, the next morning the Sassiya was blown up very near the wreck of the Otsego. A number of torpedoes were found in the river channel, a representation of one of which adjoins the sketch already alluded to. The rebels had also erected Grisham had posted on beyond Jamesville to Foster's Mills, where a body of the enemy were in force, consisting of 600 mounted infantry.

On the 20th the fleet passed Poplar Point, where it encountered rebel batteries, but found the troops thicker than ever. The land-force appeared to be unable to afford any substantial aid, and the fleet withdrew down the river to Jamesville.

GENERAL GRIERSON'S RAID.

General Dana, with a force of cavalry, a cavalry force which struck the Mobile and Ohio Railroad five miles below Corinth, on the 21st of December. Forrest's men had succeeded in destroying the road to a point south of Okolona, when they were met by the Federal cavalry. Thirty-two railroad cars, three hundred army wagons, and four locomotives were destroyed. Forrest's army, made up of dismounted men at Hyvania was dispersed, and six officers with them captured. Dana then moved upon Meridian for destroy the road to Meridian, and, if possible, to release our prisoners at Cahaba.

MORE ABOUT STONEMAN'S RAID.

Every subsequent report of the raid undertaken in Southwestern Virginia by General Stoneman, Burbridge, and Gillem, adds to the success of the raid. Thus far, 16 General Gillem was allotted a very prominent part in the expedition. He destroyed the salt-works toward the rich in our favor at Saltville. Stoneman had avoided Saltville, passing through Wytheville, Marion, Glade, and a part to the left. Breckinridge, learning that Burbridge had a force about Abingdon, between Saltville and Glade Spring, attacked him with some success. At this juncture Gillem came up with his brigade, and, passing Knights, Ninth, and Thirteenth Tennessee—charged the force pressing the rear of Burbridge's force, 300 prisoners, 30 wagons, and Breckinridge's head-quarters. Burbridge passed the rebel force at Abingdon, and continued just in time to take part in the destruction of the salt-works. The impression is that the damage done to property the fact that 6000 bushels of the article were turned out from works daily.

The expedition captured and brought away 800 prisoners, 6000 horses, and many mules. Burbridge's force had fifteen pieces of artillery, destroyed 11 locomotives, 59 floating and saw mills, 20 bridges, 13 locomotives, 400 wagons, and 1,000 bales of cotton. All of which was taken by Gillem. The rebel loss in stores alone amounted to two millions of dollars.

MAJOR GUNTHER'S MESSAGE.

The MAYOR complains that the heads of the Departments of the City Government cannot transact entirely independent of the views of the Mayor. He refers to the change made in the charter depriving the Mayor of the control over the police force. The Board of Commissioners and the Mayor, as the direct representatives of the people of the city, should have the power to exercise a direct control over its municipal affairs, and it is an evident anomaly to have the head of the police force held to be equal the power will, and who are irresponsible to the magistrates of the citizens." The Mayor refers to the great responsibilities of our City debt proper is $21,722,175; the County debt $15,954,000, payable in twenty-three years and a half million dollars. Against this the Mayor reckon that the City, exclusive of the water-works, owns no real estate, in lands, buildings, wharves, etc., of between forty fifty millions of dollars.

The Mayor cordially approves of the appropriation made in behalf of the Croton Aqueduct, and advocates retrenchment in the expenses of the current year. The Mayor urges the necessity of the Hamilton Square, east of Central Park, as a military parade-ground, and against the proposal to remove the Battery. The Battery piers should be built of stone. He urges that the example of London should be followed, by diverting the sewer from the river. This, the Mayor forgets was a necessity in London, in which the rivers are the most convenient avenues of drainage.

THE METROPOLITAN POLICE REPORT.

If our city is governed by a portion of its response bility rests upon the Police. Mr. Acton, in his report, complains—and with much variety of considerations—that while the Police have it in their power to make arrests for offense against the peace, they have not sufficient power in the premises to insure the prevention of crime. This he regards as a failure to secure the end contemplated. The hotels, restaurants, dram-shops, the theatres and places of amusement, the gambling-houses, the brothels, houses, cartmen and omnibus drivers should, he thinks, be under the supervision of the Board of Police. The regulations made in the previous report, that a morgue should be established, is renewed.

Robberies and burglaries are chiefly successful on account of the facilities which they have for disposing of stolen goods. The pawn-brokers are subject to very serious question, and their profits are even greater than those accruing to the receivers of stolen goods. A pawnbroker in good standing recently received from a negro girl a diamond pin worth $1,000 in pledge for a loan of $50. Hundreds of instances of this character have been detected, and still the annoyance to those pawnbrokers is continued.

During the war there has been a great increase of crime, and especially of those crimes which involve personal violence. In 1860, in the City of Boston, "in no city in the civilized world, not the theatre of actual war, is human life so lightly regarded as it has been in a large branch from violence, as in New York and Brooklyn." There were arrested by the Metropolitan Police, for crimes of violence of a serious character, in 1863 and 1864 respectively, as follows:

For felonious assault	518	427
For assaults on policemen	19	23
For attempt at rape	23	27
For inciting females in the street	65	58
For murder	19	17
For manslaughter	3	7
For committing rape	1	1
For rape	21	14
For demanding life	3	3
Total	575	577

A small portion of this mass of high crime has received the punishment provided by the laws. The fault, if any exist, is somewhere beyond the power of the police.

During the year five policemen have been murdered, and thirteen have been seriously injured. As one of the means to prevent crime, Mr. Acton suggests the offer of rewards from a fund established for that purpose.

The number of truant children reported by teachers to the police during the year was 4633. Most of these were visited, and twenty-2000 reformed as to attend school regularly. "The Act of April 15, 1853, 'to provide for the care and education of idle and truant children,' authorizes the creation of such an institution by municipal authorities, but it has never been carried into effect. An amendment to render it practically effective would be the establishment of a building great enough for the accommodation of the rising generation, and upon society. The streets of our city are filled with truants and vagrants, the offspring of misery and misfortune; they are in training in the school of vice and crime, and crime, unless it already so numerous as to threaten the welfare of society in the very existence of Government."

The organized asylums are nearly all full; at least this is the case with the asylums which receive the vagrant class of children succored for.

Mr. Acton has made a useful suggestion to prevent violent outbreaks in the city, viz: the organization of a Police Band, to assist in parades.

The present Fire Department of the City consists of 1987 firemen, having in charge and under their care 33 and 18 hand fire-engines. Mr. Acton thinks the present force large, and the service is lacking in efficiency because it is a volunteer force. In Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and other cities, the municipal authorities have dispensed with with good results. Mr. Acton urges the substitution of a force for those cities.

Mr. Acton thinks that it would conduce to the good order of the city if the practice of sound rendering it a crime to carry concealed deadly weapons.

OUR CITY FINANCES.

The total amount of moneys disbursed on city, county, and State accounts for the year has increased to somewhat over fifteen millions of dollars. Of this sum four millions have been expended by the city authorities, the remaining eleven millions having been disbursed through the county authorities, and chiefly under Acts to control.

THE COMMERCIAL RECORD FOR 1864.

During the year just passed there have been, in the City of New York, 1,090,000,000 liabilities amounting in the aggregate to eight millions and a half. The number of failures in the same States in 1857 was over four thousand, and in 1861 over 1,500,000,000. The failures were nearly six thousand failures; though the liabilities were less than one-half of those of 1857. Since 1861 the number of failures has steadily diminished. The Business of the year 1864 has been more active than that of 1863 in number, representing nearly five thousand millions of dollars.

FOREIGN NEWS.

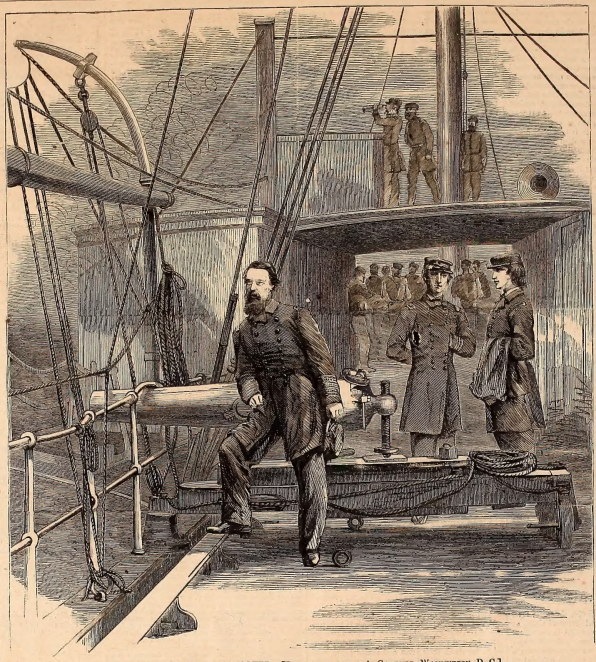
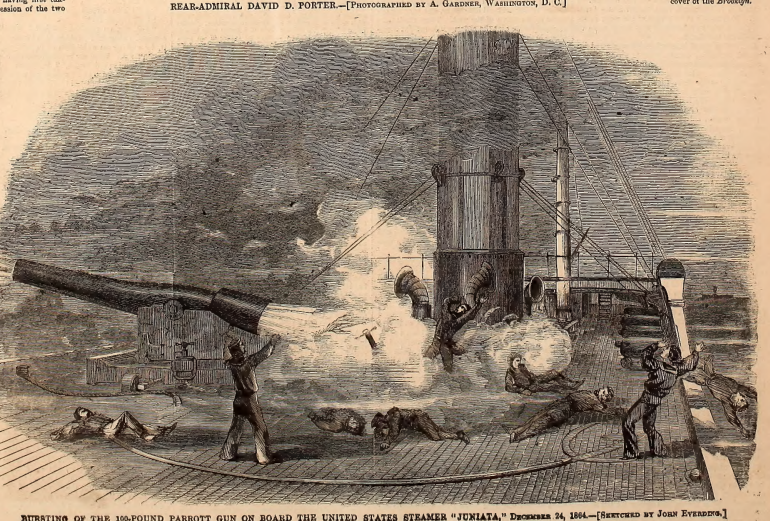
THE UNION ARMY ENTERED SAVANNAH ON THE 21st DECEMBER, AND ON THE 24th THE FIRST NUMBER OF THE LOYAL GEORGIAN WAS ISSUED.

THE WILMINGTON EXPEDITION.



REAR-ADMIRAL DAVID D. PORTER, the commander of the naval division of the late Wilmington Expedition, is a son of the famous Commodore PORTER of the Essex. He is about fifty years of age, and has belonged to the navy over thirty years. A few years ago, when he commanded the Crescent City, he attracted considerable attention by persisting in an effort to enter the port of Havana under the shotted guns of Moro Castle, and against the order of the Spanish authorities. He took an active part in reducing the forts below New Orleans, and was afterward engaged in the memorable naval actions on the Mississippi.

Considerable fault has been found with the management of the military division of the expedition. The editor of the Norfolk Anti-Review, who accompanied General BUTLER, gives an account which explains the nature of the difficulties that our soldiers had to encounter after landing.



According to this account a thousand men had debarked from the transports at half past two o'clock on the afternoon of the 25th. At this time PORTER'S flag-ship came alongside of BUTLER'S, and, after the customary salutations, and as the ships were drifting apart, the Admiral cried through his trumpet, "General, there is not a rebel within five miles of the fort. You have nothing to do but throw in troops and occupy it." The General, turning to some one near him, said, quietly, "I have a fellow on shore there, one WEITZEL, who will find that out." In fact, while this conversation was going on, WEITZEL, with his staff, accompanied by a member of BUTLER'S staff, was approaching the fort, the troops under GRAHAM and CURTIS having first taken possession of the two sand-works, Flag-pond and Half-moon batteries. WEITZEL and his party soon found themselves on the northern front of Fort Fisher, and within range of seventeen guns, some of which, supported by musketeers, opened upon them.

It was now discovered, from the prisoners which had been taken with the captured batteries, that, instead of there being no rebels within five miles of the fort, there were 800 men in the work; and that instead of 36 guns—the estimated armament of the fort—there were nearer 60; and that the garrison were securely stowed away in the casemates. He also learned that HOKE'S division was then encamped within a mile of the fort. Indeed, this division, consisting of a force nearly equal to BUTLER'S entire command, was now attacking the Federal troops in the rear, though, fortunately, the latter were covered by the fire of the Brooklyn.

According to this account WEITZEL was certainly not in an advantageous condition for an attack. Behind him was the sea; before him was the fort, still uninjured as a defensive work, and only waiting the cessation of the bombardment which must come with night, to open upon him in full force; and upon his flank was a rebel division outnumbering his own, while a regiment of South Carolina cavalry was at Masonborough Inlet. If this view of the situation be a correct one no censure can certainly fall upon BUTLER and WEITZEL for their determination to re-embark the troops. The process of embarkation commenced at five o'clock. Not only our own men were to be brought off, but 800 rebel prisoners also, including 10 officers; and this was to be accomplished in spite of a high-rolling surf, which forced BUTLER to leave 300 of his men on shore overnight, under cover of the Brooklyn.

REAR-ADMIRAL DAVID D. PORTER.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY A. GARDNER, WASHINGTON, D. C.]

BURSTING OF THE 100-POUND PARROTT GUN ON BOARD THE UNITED STATES STEAMER "JUNIATA," DECEMBER 24, 1864.—[SKETCHED BY JOHN EVERDING.]

The mistake, then, was not in the failure to make an assault, which must have issued disastrously. It will be objected that the fire of the fleet made the garrison useless, by keeping them in their bomb-proofs. But until the assault was made there was no reason for the garrison to leave their bomb-proofs. If our force had attempted an assault, as at Fort Wagner, the garrison, we may rest assured, would have made their appearance at the right moment. As to the fire of the fleet, as soon as our forces should have reached the immediate vicinity of the fort, this fire, if kept up, would have told as effectually against the assailants as against the assailed. As it was, even in the reconnoissance ten of our men were wounded by our own fire. It is true that a flag was carried off, a horse stolen, and an orderly bearing dispatches killed, and naturally the question regarding the loss of the whole column advance and take the fort? But how was it at Fort Wagner? There hundreds of our men got inside the ditch—part of which they held over an hour; and yet Fort Wagner was not taken. When it was taken afterward it was by siege. At Fort Fisher, too, there were elements of resistance which did not exist at Wagner. Besides an armament twice as heavy, there was in front of the work a ditch from eight to ten feet in depth, which could be crossed only by a bridge twenty feet in length. Under these circumstances, and remembering that of the fort the sedition was undertaken. Our naval and military authorities have had sufficient experience to have avoided so glaring a mistake as this. The Generals have changed since BUTLER and STRINGHAM took Forts Clark and Hatteras. The rebels have learned, if we have not, how much dependence can be put on a strong earth-work stubbornly and prudently defended: and they are not so easily frightened by the mere mention of an assault as formerly were.

Wilmington will be taken, and so will Charleston; but they will be taken as SHERMAN took Savannah—by a formidable investment, or else by our occupation of such positions as render them untenable or unimportant.

We illustrate on the preceding page the bursting of a 100-pound Parrott gun on board the Juniata. A similar accident occurred on board several vessels. In this way a larger number of our men were wounded than by the guns of the fleet. The fact is, cases may have been why all these accidents—there were six of them—should have happened only to Parrott guns, a problem to which the naval authorities will, we hope, give the proper attention.

THE DUTCH CANAL.

We have previously, in No. 410, Volume VIII., given an illustration of General BUTLER'S Dutch Canal at Dutch Gap, while the work was still in operation. The more picturesque and interesting sketch, which we give on the first page, we reproduce from a photographic view, for which we are indebted to Captain S. L. LANGDON, First United States Artillery. This sketch gives a view of the work in the last stages, while preparations were being made to explode the bulk-head.

Dutch Gap Canal was originally suggested by General BUTLER. James River is an extremely tortuous stream, and especially so in its course past Farrar's Island. This peninsula, misnamed an island, is forty miles from Richmond by the river, although it is only a short three miles in a straight line. The bend of the river here takes it seven miles out of its way, bringing it around again to a point only two hundred yards from its point of deflection. A canal across these two hundred yards not only saves a journey of seven miles, but also avoids the obstructions and batteries which make the bend impassable to our fleet.

The work was surveyed on the 7th of August, and three days afterward was actually commenced. Brigadier-General B. C. LUDLOW, of General BUTLER'S staff, acted as superintendent, assisted by Major PETER E. HAINES, Chief of Engineers. The enemy occupied elevated positions threatening the workmen, and it was necessary at first to proceed in the same manner as in throwing up parallels in front of an enemy's fortifications. To the beginning a decidedly covered the working parties who at first dug ditches, throwing the earth up as a breastwork. Several of these at length merged into a single wide ditch, with a dam left so that the rush of water in opening the inner part of the canal would not disturb the workmen in the upper part, who were to dig fifteen feet below tide-mark. Soon such progress was made that rails were laid and cars started in the place of wheel-barrows.

The enemy erected mortar batteries under cover of the river-bank, which proved a great annoyance. Them bomb-proofs had to be built for security to the workmen. In the beginning only negro soldiers were employed, but these were subsequently relieved by colored soldiers. These suffered much from fever, brought on by the dampness to which they were exposed.

By the middle of November fifteen thousand cubic yards of earth had been removed by hand, and a steam dredge removed, in addition, fifty tons a day. In little over a month more all that remained to be done was to remove the dam between the two sections and the bulk-head still left at the upper end. The dam was easily removed by mining. More elaborate preparations, however, had to be made for the removal of the bulk-head. This was cut into three pieces, as far as possible. Streets were cut through, and thus one-third of the mass of earth removed. From the vertical cut on the left of the centre galleries were run toward the centre; and, after reaching a proper point, a shaft was sunk twenty-eight feet in depth, from which galleries ran toward the river. These galleries were connected, capable all together of holding six tons of powder, and at four o'clock P.M. on New-Year's Day the grand explosion took place. The effect was hardly what was expected. A great proportion of the earth fell back again into the canal, and will have to be removed by the dredging-machine under circumstances not especially advantageous. The length of the canal is between five and six hundred feet, its greatest width is about one hundred and twenty-two feet, and its greatest depth about seventy feet. Unfortunately the entire length of the canal is not open to the river as yet.

Since its commencement seven thousand shells have been thrown in and around the canal; fifty men have been killed there, and one hundred wounded; forty-five horses have been killed, three barges sunk, and nine tugs disabled. The engineer who has superintended the work, Major D. MCMURR, has been Brevet Major, for meritorious services during the campaign. He is a graduate of West Point, has been in the department, and a great favorite among his brother officers.

LOYAL SAVANNAH.

THE situation of Savannah, since its restoration to the Union, may be considered as a fair example of the general state of the South when the restoration of that misguided section shall have been finally accomplished. The fact that the Commander of Europe's defeat will produce an effect as demoralizing upon the remaining citizens of the Confederacy as the latest news from Savannah. A country of vast resources, really contending against oppression, may look upon the spectacle of a defeated army and still remain hopeful and determined. But when a great section like the South, entangled against the popular will and through the delusive pretext of ambitious leaders in the attempt to secure slavery from the first, looks upon a spectacle which illustrates the deceit practiced upon the people and the criminality of the leaders by which they have been involved, the effect is startling and revolutionary.

Such a spectacle is afforded to the people of the South in the unconditional loyalty of the citizens of Savannah. When New Orleans was captured the case was quite different. The animus of rebellion had got into the air, and was not yet in a state of lassitude so evident. Besides, there was considerable difference in the original temper of the people of the two cities. Savannah was captured at a time when the Confederacy had been reduced almost to hopelessness, and it was captured under circumstances which left the civil authorities of the rebel Commander-in-Chief. It was to be expected, therefore, that the emotion which her citizens would display would be that of indignation against DAVIS, and of passive acquiescence to the Federal power. But how will the rebel leaders feel when they read the proceedings that actually followed upon the capture of the city, and find that, instead of passive submission, there is an element of exultation—of positive joy—at the fact instead of regret?

The city was captured on the 21st. Just one week afterward the municipal citizens was held under the call of their old Mayor, Doctor RICHARD ARNOLD, and resolutions were unanimously adopted to lay aside party feuds, and to unite in submitting to the national authority under the Constitution, laying aside all differences, and burying by gones in the grave of the past. These resolutions explicitly state that the citizens "do not put themselves in the position of dictating the future policy of a conqueror," but that of citizens of the United States. They, moreover, request GOVERNOR BROWN to call a Convention of the people of Georgia, to give the latter an opportunity of pronouncing for or against the continuance of the war.

It is probable that Governor BROWN'S command will occupy Savannah when General SHERMAN orders upon the new campaign for which he has been making preparations. Governor BROWN'S action thus orders in relation to the city are beneficent and judicious. While Savannah is to be held as a military post, still municipal affairs will be left to the 20,000 people within its limits, and for such others as may come. All the ordinary pursuits of life are to be continued, and commerce is encouraged so far as it is free of blame; for gossip, as a rule, deals in dark things and in the past, and begins with a yet grounded fact there are thousands head downward, with all four members in the air, and the fact is—they swim.

AN ANCIENT HUMAN RELIC.—The Nouvelliste of Rouen relates the following strange circumstance: "The Abbé Cochet has just made a discovery. Also property on the borders of the Forest of Cinglais (Calvados), near his ground he has found a Celtic cemetery. A few days since some workmen, who were employed in cutting down one of these tombs, found a skeleton in a sitting posture. The latter took the body of a man, which, on being touched, fell to dust. By the side of the skeleton, covered of a lump, the iron head of which alone was perfect. The supposition is that the man had been killed by a blow of a hatchet, and that, as soon as an incision made in the gyse, the bark of which had afterward grown over the wound, the wounded man, being of an antique form of the lance-head, the belief is that he was one of the Celtic warriors who fought in Gaul at the time the North who first invaded Neustria.

The Abbé Cochet proposes to raise the following incident connected with the battle of Nachville: "I was near General Thomas one morning, when a shower of bullets rained in among his staff—the whole assemblage being in the open field. The rebel lines were 'Why,' said the General, 'I believe the scoundrels are shooting at me.' He did not remain, however, another moment, until duty called him to another part of the field."

A LAUGHABLE incident of the bribery practiced at the Washington end of the line is told by a correspondent. An Irishman, who thought his vote worth half a day's pay, presented himself at the polls to receive his ticket. He went to the tavern where the ballots and bribes were distributed, and received his ticket. Not supposing he was all right, went over to the polls to deposit it, which he did without examination. This done, he then returned to the tavern to get his dollar, and was astonished at being told that a bill for that amount was inclosed in his ticket. He had certainly deposited both the dollar and ballot in the box, and had the assurance, after the closing of the polls and while the tickets were being counted, to go to the inspectors and claim the money. The bill was found in the ballot, but the latter was thrown out, and the Irishman did not get his dollar.

BRIDE AND GROOM A CENTURY AGO.—To begin with the lady: Her locks were strained upward over an immense cushion that sat like an incubus on her head, and plastered over with pomatum, and then sprinkled over with a shower of white powder. The dress of this tower was somewhat out of date. One single white rose-bud lay on the left side of the bosom, as a boyscout. A powdered broom was folded a lace handkerchief, fastened in front by a brown-pin rather larger than a dollar, containing your grandfather's miniature set in virgin gold. Her airy form was braced up in stiff stays, the sleeves set short at the natural skirt of the arm, with a waist formed by a bodice, extending from whence the skirt flowed off, and was distended at the top by an ample hoop. Shoes of white kid, with peaked toes, and heels of two inches inches' elevation, reclined her feet, and glittered with spangles, as her little pedal members preped curiously out. Now for the swain: His hair was stocked back and plentifully bedewed with powder, and tied behind in a bundle of a skillet. His coat was a sky-blue silk, lined with yellow; his vest was made of white satin, embroidered with gold; his breeches of the same material, and tied at the knee with white strings. His silk stockings met the pumps, with laces, and these of the same hue completed the habiliments of his nether limbs. Lace ruffles encircled his wrist, and perforated frills worked in correspondence, and bracing the surface of his beloved, finished his truly genteel appearance.

A WONDERFUL FAT MAN.

SI was idling about one of these towns the inhabitants of which, from a reverence for attention to theatres, are obliged to depend, for amusement, on itinerant showmen, comic recitationists, popular preachers, and circuses, and other shows, my attention was drawn to a placard by a band of nigger minstrels stationed on the outside of it, playing appropriate airs. Above and behind the minstrels was a wonderful specimen of Art indicated the wonderful works of Nature to be seen within. Among these paintings was a full-length portrait of a monstrous fat man, in large illuminated letters underneath his portrait, "The Second Daniel Lambert." I thought I should like to see this wonderful fat man, and being what is euphemistically called stout myself, walked up and demanded gratuitous admission on the ground of being one of the brotherhood. But that, the money-taker said, could not entitle me to see the lions and tigers, because, if I was a monster, still I was not a fat one. I accepted the compliment, paid my money, and went in.

The Fat Man was in a sort of annexe to the caravan. He panted and perspired very much.

"Hard work, Sir," I observed.

Puffing laboriously, he answered, "Yes, Sir!"

"I hope, Sir," I said, "that your exertions are liberally rewarded by Mr. Saunders"—the name of the showman.

"I am Mr. Saunders, Sir. I am my own proprietor."

"No! Are you, though, really? Well, Sir, I admire your moral courage. You show your sense, Sir, in thus accepting your situation, and making the most of it."

"Ah, Sir!" he said, "I have made the most of myself indeed. This fat, Sir!—he did not say this new fat, but one very much like a gentleman—"all this fat is not natural."

"Is it not?"

"No, Sir. I am"—here he slightly chuckled—"what you may call a self-made man."

"Ah!" said I, "that's what we stout gentlemen most of us are, Sir, at the end. We do not like pipes of ourselves with our eyes open—in that particulars unlike the pipes."

"I did it on purpose, Sir."

"On purpose, Sir?"

"Yes, Sir, on purpose. When I started this concern, I thought it might as well become part of it, by making an exhibition of myself. I had a reason for it. What are appearances, Sir?"

"Felt quite a philosopher," said I, "Sir, I respect your contempt for appearances, and for the people who are astonished by them, and not mine. You are a man, Sir. And so you made yourself of this size, Sir?"

"I did, Sir."

"How did you do it, Sir?"

"The old way, Sir—eating and drinking.

"What did you eat, Sir?"

"Potatoes. I ate a good deal of potatoes. And bread, Sir. Ate a good deal of bread. You see, Sir, I did just the reverse of what Mr. Banting recommends for bringing this down."

"Did you, Sir?"

"Yes, Sir, better. I ate a good deal of that. Sugar, too; large quantities of sugar. Sugar's very fattening, contains so much carbon; dissolves so fast and runs into fat. Tarts, puddings, sweets of all kinds. Fork too, Sir, pork: ate a great deal of pork. Not much bacon; no. Don't like it; like filling to fat, never eat more than I can help, unless, rich, nourishing; very fond of stewed eels. Milk and cream; have two bowls of bread and milk for my breakfast, with cream and sometimes Sir, as much as possible of food containing plenty of oil, starch, and saccharine matter."

"What did you drink, Sir?"

"As much fluid as possible, Sir; as much of every pleasant fluid. A good deal of tea, Sir, I've been told for that food. Also, ale, good fat Burton. Stout. Fruity port. Cliequot's Champagne. Hot rum and water, strong and sweet."

"You must have had a strong motive, Sir, to induce you to acquire a bulk which appears to be distressing."

"I had, Sir. My wife died, Sir, and at the same time I experienced a reverse of fortune. I have one son, Sir, to whom I am desirous of giving a good education. Having had an indifferent one myself, I had no means of earning the wherewithal by intellectual exertion, and was unable to afford exertion of any kind. Thought that the least troublesome way of getting money would be riding about with a show. At that time Mr. Barring's pamphlet fell in my way. It made an impression on me. I wanted a wonderful fat man. Couldn't one be made by practicing the contrary of Banting's rules? Why not make one of myself? As I had determined to start a show, fancied that the pleasantest occupation would be that of creating myself up, as my son says, for its chief attraction."

"Sir," said I, "you are a wonderful father. You are a prodigy of parental affection."

"He's in there now, Sir," said the fat man, pointing to a green-baize partition at the back of the van. "Home for the vacation from the University."

"Come, Governor," called a voice from behind the green baize. "Time to shut up. Want to light my cigar."

"He's not in orders yet," observed the fond father.

"Come, I say, Governor!" repeated the undergraduate.

"Bless you, Sir!" I cried, grasping the Fat Man's hand. "May your Boy prove a blessing to you! Farewell!"

And I rushed away.

THE PERPLEXITIES OF A SOMNAMBULIST.

I HAD been for twenty years a clerk in a merchant's office, without a hope of ever getting one step higher or of being able to do more than secure a modest provision for old age by dint of small economies and much self-denial. One morning I awoke and found myself a man of property. The post had brought an announcement of the death of an old uncle of my father's, to whose property I was heir-at-law; no will having been found since his death.

After all, it was not a very grand inheritance. But it was an independence, and quite enough to satisfy all the modest wants and wishes of a merchant's clerk.

The notary who had announced my succession to my grand-uncle's property met me at the railway station, upon my future home. My first question was how he knew of my relationship to the deceased, who had long ceased to hold any communication with his family, and had been almost forgotten by them.

"I knew it from a will that I made for him last December. He said, "which document if it had still existed would have deprived me of the pleasure I now enjoy of making your acquaintance. I must tell you that some five years ago, your granduncle took a young girl into his family, the orphan daughter of a former whom he had known for years. This girl assisted the housekeeper, Madame Lemaitre; and, when the old gentleman was ill, nursed him with the affection and devotion of a daughter. To her he left all his property, except a small legacy to yourself as his sole living relative."

"But the will? What became of it?"

"It was not to be found after your kinsman's death, and the housekeeper asserts that he destroyed it himself, and was about to make another in her favor, but was prevented by his sudden death."

"Why had he altered his intentions?"

Doricourt shook his head.

"The old woman asserts that he had had, of late, some cause to doubt the honesty of his young girl Suzanne. He had lost a great many articles of value. Suzanne has a brother who bears a very bad character, and Bernard believed (according to Madame Lemaitre) that the girl had robbed him to supply the necessities of this good-for-nothing relative."

"Truly," said I, "he was right, then, to change his mind. But it is fortunate for me that he did not execute another will, since a servant was still to have been preferred to his kinsman. What has become of Suzanne?"

"Well, Sir," replied the notary, with a little hesitation, "she takes charge of the poultry, and is invaluable as a dairy woman; therefore I could not dismiss her till you arrived and could suit yourself with another maid. I must beg your charitable consideration for this poor young girl, who is homeless and destitute, and at present without a character to obtain another place."

"I will be hoped, doubtless, to possess the farm itself," I added, considerably touched by the sad change in this unfortunate's circumstances. So talked of and of the property of Mr. Doricourt, suddenly pointing with his whip over his shoulder, exclaimed:

"There is your farm."

It was a substantial looking house, with tall chimneys, surrounded by ample orchards, but certainly not possessing any claim to be considered a picturesque dwelling.

We drove up to the door, which was opened by a young girl of nineteen.

As we passed into the house I looked at her with interest. She was a tall, well-made young woman, with a fair, fresh complexion, large blue eyes, and light-brown hair. There was a certain patches in her voice, and a resigned sadness in her countenance which excited my pity.

My dreams that night were all of Suzanne—of this disinherited, accused orphan.

The jealous eye of old Lemaitre detected an understanding between me and my servant, and it was not long before Suzanne suffered for it. I found as I was passing an open door of one of the bedchambers, I heard Lemaitre scolding the poor girl cruelly. She reproached her with deceit, with artifice, and with unmaidenly forwardness. At first Suzanne made no reply; when she did at last answer it was with angelic mildness and gentleness. Her meekness appeared to provoke the old fury still more, and she actually struck the young girl a blow on the face. This was more than I could endure. I entered the room, and sternly demanded what she meant by such conduct? Her answer was a storm of accusations against Suzanne, whom she called a thief and a hypocrite.

"If you wish to be safe in life and property, you had better dismiss her at once," she screamed. "She won't get honestly angry—not she! She is waiting her time to give me a quieting potion, I suppose."

A low ejaculation of horror from Suzanne interrupted her.

"Madame Lemaitre," said I, sternly, "you can not know what you say. But I will not suffer so ungovernable a temper. You will quit my service at once."

"Very well," she replied, insolently. "If it hasn't been for an evil chance or worse I should have been mistress here. That girl has got round you with her big blue eyes and her calm face—but she will sell you yet to Jacques."

(Jacques was Suzanne's brother.)

Poor Suzanne murmured words of meek sorrow and reproach. My own temper was fairly roused.

"You shall quit the house this very day," I said; "I wonder you dare to stay in it. Suzanne, you will accompany me, and do not see this woman again."

Thus I dismissed Madame Lemaitre. I installed Suzanne in her place.

The days went on smoothly but monotonously. Winter at last stole on us. The weather was dark and dreary; the cold intense.

One evening I bade Suzanne bring her work, and come to keep me company. I found this young girl well-read in our best authors, shrewd, intelligent, even witty. I desired her to come again the next evening, and it became an established custom henceforward that she should read to, and talk to me.

One evening I was amusing myself when she entered by looking at the few family jewels which I had inherited from my great-uncle. Doricourt had given me the old casket containing them on the day of my arrival at the farm; but hitherto I had had neither time nor inclination to examine them.

They consisted of a pair of bracelets of enamel, clasped with diamonds, which had probably belonged to my great-grandmother, judging from their antique fashion; a huge pair of enormous gold buckles, and a garnet necklace; there was also an old watch inlaid with stones. While I still held the bracelets in my hand Suzanne entered the room, and uttered an exclamation of surprise and admiration.

"Oh, Sir, what beautiful bracelets!"

"They are yours, Suzanne," I answered; "did you never see them before?"

"Oh no, Sir. Our poor master kept that casket and the plate in his bureau. Doricourt only brought them here the day you came."

"Why were they kept at the bank?" I asked.

"For fear of robbers, Sir. There are bad men in this part of the country is not very safe. They would cut a man's throat for less than one of those bracelets."

"But," I said, looking at her watchful eyes, "no one but yourself, Suzanne, knows that I keep these jewels in the house, or that the plate is in my dressing-room."

"That is true, Sir," she answered, simply.

"Then mind you mention it to no one," I commanded.

"You shall be obeyed;" and her eyes still lingered admiringly on the ornaments.

"Yes; look at them well," I said more gently, "that you once were to have possessed this house and these very jewels. Tell me, Suzanne, why did my great-uncle destroy the will made in your favor?"

She blushed crimson, up to the very roots of her hair.

"Sir," she said, tremulously, "I was wickedly belied to my master. I do not know by whom. But I have my doubts and suspicions as to my secret enemy. I have a brother—alas! a very bad young man. He always leaves a message for me with others. He came here to try and obtain a little help from me in his sore need. Now, when I came into the house here I did not doubt that I should hold no further communication with my brother. But one day Jacques stood at our kitchen door, looking as if he meant nearly to break open the door. I could not see my brother perish! He was at the last extreme of want and misery; I gave him food; but I did it without the knowledge of my aunt (I might not even thus rob my good master. I gave him also my wages—but nothing more—oh! nothing more; I assure you, Sir;" and she clasped her hands in earnest asseveration.

"Madame Lemaitre came into the kitchen and found me speaking to Jacques. She questioned me, and she was very angry. She told my master, and declared she should be afraid to sleep at night lest Jacques might come in and murder me. But though he was wild and idle, Jacques was incapable of such a crime. Imagine my distress, my scandal!—the very next day there was missing from master's own room his silver snuff-box, his watch, his purse! No one had broken into the house; the doors and windows were all safely fastened as when we went to rest. The whole house was searched for the lost things in vain. We never saw them again. My master was very angry, and, alas! still more grieved. He accused me of having stolen them, and given them to Jacques. He was deaf to my protestations of truth and of shame and misery. He told me he had left me his property, but that I should receive no more. And he burned his will before my face. Madame Lemaitre says he intended to have made another in her favor, but, happily, he died."

And he did not dismiss you under these circumstances of grave suspicion?" I said, seriously.

"No, Sir. My master was the most benevolent of men. He well knew the value of character to a woman! He retained me. He had pity on my youth, he said. He was kind and good to me to the last."

"It was a frightful position for you to be placed in," I said, "and I have you any idea what had become of the lost articles?"

"At first I feared Madame Lemaitre had been very wicked and had taken them; but I saw no little trouble; but I don't think now she had—I watched her so closely—I searched so constantly..... No, it is a mystery which only the good God can reveal in His own good time."

I talked but little that evening. I took a book, and the women conversed in whispers. But my thoughts wandered constantly to the strange robbery which had deprived Suzanne of my inheritance. It seemed so greatly that such a deeds should have rested on Suzanne, and my feelings about it revealed to me the fact I had willfully ignored hitherto, that I was staid man of forty, who had never yet felt the slightest tenderness for living woman, and had been long ago set down as a confirmed bachelor—had absurdly fallen in love with my female servant! It was a severe mortification to me.

I determined to struggle against my misplaced passion to the best of my power. Now, I resolved to send Suzanne away with an annuity for her life; then, again, to sell my farm. In the midst of these perplexities I fell ill.

But the next morning found me reluctant to make myself miserable. I had not sufficient pride to be heroic in love. Instead, I determined to keep my own secret and wait. And.....every day made Suzanne dearer to me.

Love, like other juvenile diseases, is worse when we take it late in life. Assuredly my infatuation for Suzanne would have raised my youthful scorn had I witnessed it in another. It made me very unhappy. I could not bear the thought of marrying my servant. I could not bear to part from her. I can never forget the nights I passed while this struggle was going on between my pride and my love. And then, as if to make matters worse, I suddenly began to doubt Suzanne's share in the singular robbery from my predecessor's chamber.

I had slept in it hitherto; I resented it now and went into another, for a fancy possessed me that there might be some hidden entrance into it.

On the day following this move Lawyer Doricourt came to see me on business, and remained the night. I put him into that same chamber.

In the morning he descended, looking a little uneasy.

"Bernard, my friend," he said, "did I leave my watch down-stairs last night?"

"No," I replied; "I saw you look at it just as we were saying 'good-night' outside your chamber."

"It is very strange," he observed; "I thought I remembered winding it up and putting it on the table last night. I could have sworn it."

"But who could have taken it? The house has not been entered. Do you fasten your chamber-door?"

"No; I am afraid of fire. And do you know that once in the night I woke and heard a movement in my room. I asked if any one was there, and received no answer. My night-light had gone out."

I felt seriously uneasy. We summoned the servants and told them of the loss. Suzanne turned visibly pale and trembled. The sharp eye of the lawyer instantly detected her emotion.

When the women had left the room, ostensibly to search for the lost watch, Doricourt said to me:

"I trust I have not given you harm by bringing you to retain Suzanne. Did you notice her change of countenance just now?"

"I did," I replied; "it was natural, when you recollect that a similarly mysterious loss ruined her worldly prospects. But, my friend," I continued, gravely, "you can not really think she would be guilty of so barefaced a robbery?"

"Not so much as I believe. You know that Suzanne has a worthless brother?"

I nodded assent.

"Well, I saw him, only yesterday, hanging about your premises, and warned him off. I said nothing about him, because I thought he meant to obey me, for he turned and walked off in the direction of the town."

I felt troubled and alarmed, I confess. Had Suzanne been so wicked as to admit the man into the house? I rang at once. When she obeyed the summons I asked her if she had seen her brother or the previous day.

"No; she had not seen him since I had arrived at the farm."

And she looked the image of candor as she spoke. But Doricourt was not so willing to place faith in her as I was.

"I don't believe her!" he exclaimed, after I had dismissed her. "With your permission, I shall at once place this affair in the hands of the police."

But I pointed out that it was an hour or two and to let me accompany him to the town.

"Have you lost any thing yourself?" he added, while we waited for the carriage.

"No; at least not that I am aware of; but since this place is so mysteriously haunted by a lovable robber, I will just take my few valuables with me and place them in the care of my lawyer."

With this intent I went to my bureau for the casket. It was not there!.....I fancied I might be mistaken; that I had locked it up with the plate which was not in daily use, and I hastened to ascertain the fact. Alas! some of the best pieces of plate were gone, and all had been removed from the closet. Nor did my losses end here. Many small treasures, only precious as heir-looms or souvenirs of dear friends, were also gone, and all had been removed from places of which I myself retained the key.

The amazement of Doricourt and myself was extreme.

"This can not be endured," he said, indignantly. "I can not forgive—not forgiveness for exposing me to such wholesale plunder. False keys have undoubtedly been used. Only a domestic traitor could have done this! I expect that some day you will awake and find yourself utterly stripped, and Suzanne gone."

"And shall I say? What could I object to his determination?

He ordered his carriage and drove off.

Suzanne, with a white, despairing face, brought in my early dinner. My heart ached as I gazed on her. Even if she were guilty (and I could not quite doubt her even yet), I loved her still.

"Suzanne," I said, "do you know what Doricourt is gone to do?"

"I can guess, Sir," she said, sadly.

"Listen," I continued, "I do not wish to expose you to a long imprisonment, nor even to the questioning of the police. Fly while there is yet time! Large tears rolled down her pale cheeks.

"You are too good, Sir," she said, gently; "that you will pardon me if I say I would rather die first. No! let them make every inquiry; let them torture me if they will. I am innocent; and sometimes I think if my good old master had not hushed up his losses to save me it had been better for me. The dreadful mystery might have been explained before now."

"You are quite innocent, then, Suzanne?"

Her look of pitiful surprise and rebuke answered me.

"Oh, Sir! But why should you not doubt me?"

And she left the room weeping. I certainly was very much inclined to do so myself. I resolutely resisted following her and telling her how I loved her.

Toward evening Doricourt returned with the police. They instituted a rigorous search all over the house, but without effect. No trace of the lost property could be found.

Then they questioned and cross-questioned Suzanne for an hour, which seemed to me endless.

And yet never had I seen her beauty so touching as when she stood meekly answering her persistent interrogatories. Once and again I interfered in her behalf, to their small amusement, especially as I saw they had no doubt of her having at least admitted her brother, and aided him in robbing me.

She was to go to jail; but it was too late to convey her thither that evening. The roads were nearly impassable, and the officers were unwilling to partake of my hospitality for the night.

Ah, that night! I can never forget it!

Before we retired to our rooms we were startled by a loud crash in the kitchen, and for the moment believed that a gang of robbers, headed by the redoubtable Jacques, were forcing a violent entrance. Doricourt and I hastened to the spot. It was only a stupid servant, who, having to get supper for the police, had thrown a pan of water in her room), had broken a bottle of wine to shivers on a kitchen-table. I scolded her for her awkwardness; but as the water was now confined to one side of the wall—not that on which the supper was spread —she loss was supplied, and the meal not interrupted.

I paced my room for more than an hour after I had wished Doricourt good-night. My anguish of mind was extreme. I felt that I had done nothing could be proved against Suzanne, the mere disgrace of a trial, and the apparent improbability of clearing her from suspicion, would drive her mad.

I did not then feel that any former pride or reluctance on my part had almost driven her to—

But I did not feel guilty?—if the property were discovered in the hands of her brother?..... I could not bear to think of it. I suffered tortures. Oh! my despised desk; my strict, but just employers. You were avenged! How I wished at that moment for my grand-uncle's will!

At length, exhausted by my emotions, I threw myself on my bed, and fell into a feverish slumber, full of dreams.

My dream was only a repetition of one that had recently haunted me; i.e., that robbers were in the house, and that I was endeavoring to conceal my treasures from them. I awoke from it, fancying Suzanne's brother had just swept off my foot with the bedclothes.

But the pain I dreamed was real and sharp; and where was I? I attempt a shrill, piercing cry of alarm. I saw standing on the table by the bare wall, amidst the broken glass of the bottle, and the blood was flowing from my wounded foot!

At first I guessed the man who was watching in the sitting-room. He came out, bringing his lamp.

"Why, Sir!" he cried. "What are you doing? You are hiding your pillow!"

And it was true! I was trying, or rather had been trying, to squeeze my pillow through a small hole you have seen in the wall, where the lath was still protruding from the hole over my head, and one of my hands grasped it.

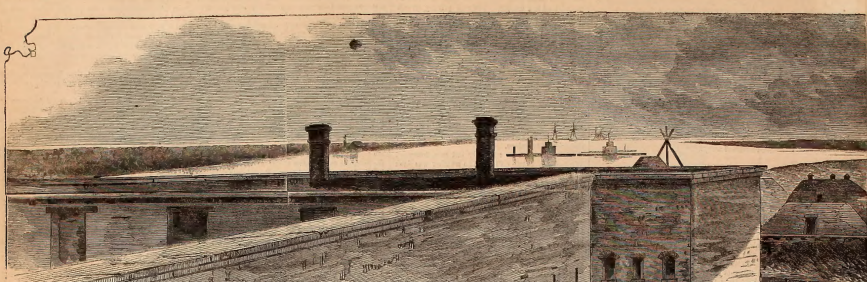
I drew it out fully; and like lightning the truth flashed on me. I was a somnambulist! I had hidden my property myself! Suzanne was innocent!

I cried for joy. He came; and one of the officers, after removing the glass, mounted the table and examined the hole, while I wiped and bound up my bleeding foot.

Yes! there was Doricourt's watch!—and there were my snuff-box, my purse, my bracelets, my money, and—double marvel!—there also were the silver snuff-box, watch, and purse of my late kinsman! Could I have doubted that Suzanne ran in our family, or that Madame Lemaitre had made the hole to conceal the articles she wished her master to suppose stolen by the girl she hated? I think the latter; though Suzanne prefers believing that the good old gentleman actually had robbed himself in his dotage. I have my own private reminiscence of having been made on purpose, and artfully designed to escape notice, as, in fact, it had that of the young girl.

Of course her innocence was at once fully established.

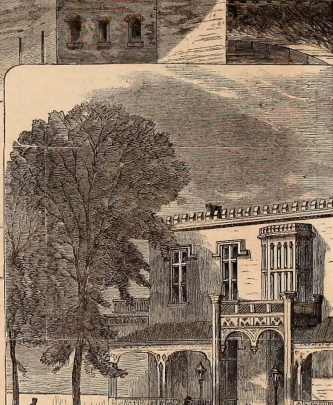
"And so it was you who stole my watch, Mr. Somnambulist!" laughed Doricourt, the next morning.



"What could have occurred to make you walk? Have you been accustomed to walking in your sleep?"

"No," I replied; "I never did such a thing before. But the truth is, Doricourt, that a country reparation I would not have grown watchful and restless at night. It is not pleasant to sleep in fear of cut-throats; and my lonely life makes me nervous. So, if you will be good enough to sell my farm I shall be satisfied with the proceeds and my uncle's savings, and return to my old life."

But it was not settled. We sold the farm, and returned to town—I say "we," for, of course, the reader has divined that I made Suzanne the only recompense I could for her unworthy suspicions my kinsman and myself had cast on her—I married her.



We live very happily. It is not known in town that I married my servant.

Suzanne is well educated, pretty, and genteel; and her humble origin is as little suspected as that she grew Madame Bernard, now a prosperous merchant, was once guilty of robbery—in his sleep.

A SILENT PARTING.

Unseen the porch we linger;
A Virginia creeper sheds
Its scarlet shower of glories
Eddying over our heads.

The white frost hangs on the maple,
Its crystals silver-bright;
The red leaves whirl and rustle
Under our feet in the night.

O'er the yellow'd woods are gleaming
The myriad stars of eve;
I look into thy soft brown eyes,
Mine own, for a brief reprieve—

From the parting that must come,
The farewell that must be spoken,
With a tender shading of pain in,
And a trustful faith unbroken.

Thou wouldest not I should stay,
Yet thou canst not bid me go;
Neither a word of love can speak—
Well, it is ever so!

That when soul is enchain'd to soul,
A sweet silence speaketh best,
Nor wanteth measure of words to tell
The hushed pulsations rest.

Upriseth the full-globed moon,
And in thy dear face in the night
I can read—all that which I fain would know—
Good-night, mine own, good-night!

MARGARET MILLER.

A STORY IN NINE CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER IX.

A STRANGE place for a lonely, unprotected woman! I tried to drive the thought from my mind, to preserve an indifference of manner while remarking the group of men gazing curiously down upon the little barges with its two contrabands, Tom and myself.

The Captain jumped into the boat with a welcome upon his face as cordial as his words.

"Miss Miller, I presume? Captain Hall, of the navy. I am very happy to offer you my protection. Your father is also honoured."

Aiding me up the steep, awkward ladder, he presented me formally to his officers, who stood awaiting the introduction with hat in hand; then led me down to the cabin—a cozy, comfortable little spot as could be, extending across the after-part of the ship, with its state-room and embrasure on either side. A centre-table, suspending lamp, cushioned lockers extending sofa-like all around, and a great swivel arm-chair, soft and silencing-provoking, were the first objects presented to the eye. The Captain's state-room opened from the forward part. Unlocking the door, he said:

"This will be your boudoir, Miss Miller. Don't be alarmed at the armaments."

Tom went in to deposit my carpet-bag and portmanteau, and issued from thence with a sort of shivering "Gor-o-mighty" on his lips at sight of the shining weapons hung around on every side.

Whether the deep mourning of my dress, my utter loneliness and dependence, or the marks of recent illness recommended me most to the Captain's paternal care, I can not tell. Certain it is to himself could have been more tender or considerate than he during the entire voyage. Before the first breakfast was over he had drawn from me the whole story, and told me in return of his own family in New York, and of their recent bereavement in the loss of his brave young son, shot in one of the hand engagements on the Mississippi. Two of the officers were invited to dine with us at the little cabin table each day; one of them proved to be a native of my own State, and had at one time been an academic student with my brother Willie.

We had a couple days for water to cross the bar at the mouth of the St. Johns; then the vessel put to sea, and set sail for Port Royal. The next evening we were entering Broad River, with Hilton Head on one hand, Bay Point on the other, and the magnificent Bay before us, dotted all over with vessels of every description, from a stately ship of the line to a tiny sail-boat. Conspicuous among them was the noble Wabash, with the admiral's pennant flying, at whose bow poured those first terrible broadsides into the rebel fors Walker and Beauregard.

It was very exciting as we went in to listen to the officers' description of their first entrance into Port Royal on the memorable 7th of November, the flag-ship leading the way, two or three sloops of war and eighteen gun-boats all pouring shot and shell into the devoted fortresses until the Palmetto flag gave way to the victorious "Stars and Stripes."

"Are there any rebel prisoners at Port Royal?" I asked the Captain as we sailed up the bay.

"Only a few in the hospitals, taken at Pulaski and James Island."

"Do you know what disposition has been made of those recently captured at Williamsburg?"

"I think the officers are at Fortress Monroe, to be sent North. Am not certain about the men."

Captain Hall brought his glass to bear upon the different vessels that crowded the levee.

"Ah! the Arago is in," he observed, handing me the telescope. "That dark, old-looking steamship in the right pier. She is the finest transport between this port and New York. I shall be able to secure you what no rebel will seem excellent accommodations after; or many discomforts here."

"If you only knew how comfortable you have made me, Captain, and how very grateful I feel for it, you would not mention discomforts. I have still another favor"—to ask of you—that when you return to the ... Johns you will, if possible, forward this letter for me. It is sealed."

"I will create an opportunity if necessary. We drop anchor here now. I will have to report to the flag-ship without delay: meanwhile I will send to inquire when the Arago sails, so as to make arrangements for your passage."

He left me to give orders, and I sat for the next hour amusing myself in observing the noble harbor and wondering why it had never been a point of commercial importance.

It was evening before the transport was to sail the next afternoon, stopping at Fortress Monroe.

I spent the morning in examining points of interest in the new city, watching the drill of the First South Carolina Regiment of darkeys, and visiting the hospitals, returning to the gun-boat to dinner. The little cabin seemed more homelike than the magnificent saloons of the Arago, and I bade it and the gallant officers of the steamer adieu with a swelling heart.

The decks of the Arago were crowded upon our arrival with every shade and condition of humanity. Officers and their families putting on airs; sick and wounded soldiers looking as though home would be a blessed heaven; a whole corps of enthusiastic teachers whose labors had somehow been brought to a premature end; cotton speculators, clergymen, and contrabands, all waiting the joyful signal to weigh anchor and depart.

Captain Gadsden came to me for a moment, saying, gallantly,

"I am charged by your escort to take the very best care of you, Miss Miller. Upon the honor of a gentleman I will do it."

He kept his word.

Tom's recent flush the first had been most exemplary, and his anxiety lest he might lose me at Port Royal was simply amusing. I had found my opportunity, and told him that if his master since we left Florida, but the way he peered around among the prisoners convinced me he had not. While the Captain's steward was getting out of port I observed him on the upper deck not far from me, and beckoned to him.

"We are nearing Fort Monroe, Tom Monroe, Tom. That is where the Williamsburg prisoners are landed. The vessel only stops a few hours. We shall have to be on the alert."

"If Mars'r George's char, Miss, dis boy'll find um, sure. I gwine own mos' ebery Florida—ole Cun'l Clinton's ob'erseer—no account fellow. Tole' him master's got..cotched, and I'd run away. Dat's all, Miss. I'se gwine to find um. Don't trust such trash."

Not quite two days to Fortress Monroe. An old gentleman, Mr. Hamilton, whom I knew had been wounded at Stono, had a permit to visit the hospitals, and kindly offered to take me under his escort to the unpromising place. I took great delicacy overcome, and so sanguine was I then of being able to discover the object of our search at once that I was informed that Colonel Hamilton had been sent North only the day before I was ready to sink with disappointment.

"How was he?" I asked.

"Very feeble; arm not doing well; probably have to undergo a second amputation. He was very obstinate about it. Said he would rather live to lose it yet, I'm afraid. Are you faint, Madam? Allow me to bring you a glass of water."

I declined the offer, but accepted a seat.

The old gentleman was more fortunate in his information. His son had written that he would be able to go North probably by next steamer. He accompanied me back to the vessel as happy as I was despondent. We met Tom.

"Oh, Miss! was lookin' fur you. I've seen him!"

"Am afraid you're mistaken, Tom. He went North yesterday."

"Jes' seen um, Miss, gittin' out one dem day big ferg'—carrying a couple of ambulances which stood on the wharf.

"Did you speak to him?"

"Didn't speak, Miss. De dam guard push me back wid his gun."

I had a feeling that Tom was not mistaken, though how to reconcile the two statements was a mystery.

The old gentleman left me at the vessel, and I hurried away to greet his son, whom he had not yet seen. I bade Tom look around the deck, and if he discovered his master report at my state-room door.

A few moments of suspense and a heavy footstep announced Tom.

"Oh, Miss! spoke to him dis yer time sure."

"Where is he?"

"Up dere, on dat stars, white as cotton."

"What did he say to you?"

"Didn't take no notus fust. Den I take his hand, and say, 'Mars'r George, don't you know Tom?' He look wild, and say, 'De debil and all! What you come from?'

Tom could say no more, and began to blubber.

"Did you tell him I was here, Tom?"

"No, Miss; didn't tell him no more to once."

"Don't, then; I will see him alone myself."

It was some time before I could compose myself sufficiently.

Tom described the very place where I might find him; and when the vessel got under way, and every body was watching the receding shores, I crept up softly and stood before him, trembling like a culprit. He gazed upon me without speaking, until I could bear it no longer and burst into tears. Then he arose, gave me his left hand, and said:

"I don't know whether to trust the evidence of my senses or not. I am under the influence of a double dose of chloroform, and may be sane and may not. Speak to me, Margy, and break the spell."

I raised his hand to my lips, but could not speak.

"Ah! that hand is worth two hands now," he said. Then, in an undertone, added, "When I saw you last I would have given my right hand willingly for one word of recognition. God is good!"

I bowed my head, not yet able to speak.

"Let us sit down here in the shadow of the wheel-house and get composed. How are you, Margy?"

"Well, nearly."

"So it was you who instigated Tom to run away, was it? I shall have to hear about it presently. How did you leave the children and Aunty Hamilton?"

"Perfectly well, but much grieved on your account."

"My poor darlings! I suppose they are grieving for you now. They have reason to."

To turn the conversation, I said:

"The hospital surgeon told me you went North yesterday. How happened it you were detained?"

"By fainting away very opportunely, I believe. At all events, I found myself in one of the hospital tents again last night instead of on the boat as I anticipated. Two or three others of the prisoners were also left for some cause."

"Where are they sending you?"

"To Lafayette, perhaps. I don't know. It doesn't matter much, Margy."

"But it matters with me, Colonel Hamilton, and I shall take you to Aunt Hannah as soon as I can."

"You can get permission to harbor a rebel," he said, finishing the sentence for me, but not as I intended.

"I mean to convert you."

"You may turn me from any thing but a principle, Margy."

The day had been very warm, but the breeze blew freshly from the north as evening drew on, and Tom, who had been reading at a respectful distance, to my state-room for a warm shawl.

"For yourself, not for me, Margy," he said, when I would have thrown it around him.

I feel too much weight on my arm now, and shall be forced to retire soon for the surgeon to dress it. You will prove a real godsend if he chooses to remain with me. At this moment he is first on my list of wants."

I saw no more of Colonel Hamilton until nearly noon the next day. He sent Tom early to inquire for me, and to say that he had rested badly and would try to get sleep. During the forenoon I met the surgeon and asked his opinion of the case. His reply was more favorable than that elicited at the hospital.

We were sitting upon the deck again that afternoon, when Tom came to me.

"I wish to ask you a question, Colonel Hamilton. Did you destroy the mortgage my brother gave you?"

"Most certainly. Why, Margy?"

"Because I have altered my mind about it, and would like to make the exchange now. When I return to Florida I shall need Southern money, and you might like the other while North."

"Bless you! You will not find me too proud to accept your offer if I have need of funds, as I have no doubt I shall. Thank you, Margy."

We did not talk much; our hearts were too full for words. Mine, notwithstanding the satisfaction that I had accomplished in part my purpose, was nigh to bursting as familiar objects began to rise before me. Nearly two years of sad vicissitude had passed since I turned for a last look at the beautiful shores which surround the bay of New York. I was full of hope then, every thing was going subdued by strong will. Where was he now? Away among the lonely cedars, on the enemy's soil. Had I not promised never to return without him? How had I kept my vow?

"Don't, Margy," Colonel Hamilton said, in a tremulous voice. "Don't give way now. I read every thought on your sad face. Robert is happier than we."

"Oh, I have left him behind!"

"Not behind, Margy. His spirit from several heights looks down pityingly upon us. I shall never forget the day when I promised him not to leave you uncared for, even though I might fail in overcoming your aversion. It was that of a boy, giving up his life, for you we live ill, Margy, so very ill, that look reproached me for allowing you to labor for me. I would have given my life to save his darling."

It was the first time he had ever called me by that tender name.

"I was very happy at the Lake. I could not have lived without occupation, and mine there was delightful. You have always been kind to me, Sir."

And was it the wish to requite some fancied obligation which impelled you to come so resolutely North at this time? I am afraid of your pride still, Margy."

"I cannot say a friend. But let us speak about other things."

Past Sutter Island and the Jersey shore—past Rocky Hill and its rebel heights—round the Battery, and up the Hudson until we reached the ship's pier, and every one was making preparations to go on shore.

"I can make my mark with my left hand," he said, as we were taking leave. "You will hear from me before leaving the city."

I took the St. Nicholas coach; he went away in a carriage with two other gentlemen, whether bound or not I could not tell.

My first work on arriving at the hotel was to address a note to a distinguished military gentleman in Washington, an old family friend—begging his influence in obtaining a parole for Colonel Hamilton until he could be exchanged. I did not hesitate to detail the obligations I was under for his unremitting care and kindness both to my brother and myself.

Then I wrote a long, tear-blotted letter to Aunt Hannah.

The next day I was surprised to see Tom. He said Mars'r George done writ a note, and wanted him to bring an answer. I had some difficulty at first with the perpendicular strokes, or rather scratches, but made it all out with study:

"I am doing nicely here in the hospital at Hamilton, my name-fort, where I was brought through the courtesy of a comparative stranger whom I met at Fortress Monroe. Every care and kindness is accorded to me, and I am in a fair way to learn to love my enemies. Let me know when you contemplate leaving the city. The surgeon promises to save the residue of my arm, but enjoins quiet for a time. I shall see you again as soon as possible."

A little necessary shopping was my excuse for waiting to hear from Washington. When the reply came every thing promised favorably. A cartel would probably be arranged soon, and Colonel Hamilton's name should not be omitted on the first exchange list. Meantime the commanding officer of the district would be instructed to grant him a limited parole.

I felt no ordinary pleasure in communicating the information to Colonel Hamilton, with the notice that I was then ready for the country.

I left that same evening on the train, and the next day, at noon, was weeping in the arms of dear Aunt Hannah. Not a question was asked, no curiosity evinced, only a strong outburst of sorrow as she clasped me to her heart, then led me away silently to her own room, where she removed my traveling garments, and had her poor weary child lie down and rest.

No neighbor was permitted to disturb my rest that day or the next, though the house was frequented by kind inquirers and sympathizers, all eager to know how I was, and how I had ever managed to get home in war time. Roberta's death, the time and place, had all been communicated in the letter from the South. She made no allusion to it until the third day, when I dressed and went to meet her in the garden.

"Poor Roberta!" Aunt Hannah said, with a sigh enough for pies," she said, showing me specimens she had just picked up. "Robert loved them extremely. Tell me, child, what will be didn't suffer for care nor nothing at the last."

He suffered for nothing, Aunt Hannah. He made friends every where."

"Set down on the garden bench here and tell me a little about it, if 'tain't too hard."

I told her in the few words as possible what I have written in detail. At the close she wiped away her tears, and fastening on me a keenly-inquiring look, said:

"One question more, Margy. Are you a rebel?"

"Every drop of blood in my heart beats true to my country and to the Union, Aunt Hannah."

"Thank Heaven! Your great-grandfather and my grandfather was cousins, and both soldiers of the Revolution. Never may their posterity forget it and turn traitors!" I was afraid about that friend you spoke on."

A week after we had an announcement. The "dear man" sent me a letter which we were at dinner. I recognized the irregular handwriting, and was conscious of Aunt Hannah's scrutiny as I hastily ran it over to her, I said:

"This concerns you as well as me. See what you think about it."

"He must be a real gentleman," she answered, "though not as handsome a hand as I have seen. I hope, Margy, he won't consider the 'invite' as the right way. Twill be done this week."

It was two weeks before he came, looking paler and thinner than when we parted in New York. Tom's words were not wanting to assure us he was not a great sufferer. Aunt Hannah received him more kindly than I apprehended from her stern loyalty, and said to me the first evening,

"He says are just the sort to win one like Robert. I don't wonder so much now, for he almost makes me forgit he is a rebel."

I think before he had been there a week she had forgotten it altogether.

The days were the apple-orchards and green fields was unbounded.

"Clar, Mars'r George, not a grain of sand yer. Jes' like all Gord's country."

"Wait," replied his master, "until the winter catches you here, my boy; then see what you think about it."

Not a slight sensation was created in our rural village by the arrival of the rebel Colonel Hamilton. To accommodate visitors Aunt Hannah, no word fell to wound the stranger whose kindness had smoothed my brother's pathway to the grave. Any remarks dropped in his presence to Robert's friend, fell naturally to politics, and even discussed the prospects of the war without harshness or vituperation, men who would move steadily forward to battle the giant wrong until the last strong-hold of the rebellion was destroyed. I alone spoke severely sometimes, when the laws of hospitality should have restrained.

He had been several weeks at the farm, riding and gaining strength every day in the clear, bracing air of our New England hills. I began to anticipate with silent dread the time when the prisoners would be exchanged, and think what an utter blank my life would be then. After all that had passed I was certain he would never ask the old question over again. How could he, when I had thrice refused him? I could not be insensible to his manner regard, however, nor of the fact that my own indifference had changed to a deep, absorbing interest.

We were conversing one evening on the probability of an agreement having already been made between the belligerents for the exchange of officers, and I congratulated him on his prospect of going home.

"The anticipation gives me scarcely less pain than pleasure," he remarked, seriously. "I see my growing paler and thinner every week, and feel that you are ill. I can not bear the thought of going away and leaving you to winter here in this rugged hill-country."

"Do you find it so unbearable then?" I asked, smiling.

"Too attractive to me altogether! But I think of the coming months with their rude storms—even for a tender one like you—and it is plain to me that this climate does not agree with you, even at this season, Margy."

"It is a northern land, and ought to be kind to her offspring."

"It has been fatal to your family, and should not be treated further. How could I make you believe me not entirely selfish in wishing you to return to Florida?"

"By demanding when I ever have found you selfish."

A clear, sharp glance penetrated the heart. I well-nigh discovered what image had stolen into my "Temple of Friendship."

"Margy," he said, drawing nearer and taking an unwilling hand, "recall those cruel words, and let me fold you to my heart once more—not as when I fought with the Angel of Death for you and conquered, but, alas! darling, I must. There, you are mine now, all mine—say not unwillingly. Lean your head upon my breast; you look pale if ever such it there. It will be father, brother, husband all in one. Why do you shrink so from that last word, Margy? Whisper once you love me."

"Better than my own life."

"And will marry me? Oh, Margy!"

"How can I? Don't urge me, my best friend!"

"Cruel! cruel!"

"If you knew how deeply it pains me to give you pain you would not call me cruel, Colonel Hamilton. Pity me, but do not call me cold or cruel."

"No, darling, I will not. Forgive me! it is I alone who am cruel. I know not what I say. Is there no way, no way, I can hope to win you?"

"None you would accept."

"Try me! Name any obligation you please, save renunciation of principle."

"Will you lay down arms?"

"I have taken them for my country; if I find myself to protect you with the other I shall have none left for the service. Nay, don't look so sad. I am only jesting. You are mine, darling, and may make your own terms. I will never give you up again!"

We were engaged that evening tacitly, if not by verbal promise.

I know it will be a mystery to many how a loyal woman can marry a rebel. It is a mystery to myself—inexplicable, sad, but sweet as any mystery of love. I am ready to cry, peccavi! mea culpa! in perfectly sincere mood. I say to Colonel Hamilton, "Would you had lost both hands in a better cause!" and can not help indulging a hope of seeing him draw a sword with his left hand but whole heart for the Union yet.

TWO DAYS WITH MOSBY.

I WAS up at reveille. Orders to inspect the camp of dismounted cavalry near Harper's Ferry had been in my pocket two days, awaiting an escort through the fifty miles of guerrilla infested country which lay between me and that distant post. This was the day for the regular train, and a thousand wagons were expected to leave Sheridan's head-quarters, on Cedar Creek, at daylight, with a brigade of infantry as guard, and a troop of cavalry as outriders.

An hour's ride of eight miles along a picketed line across the valley brought me to the famous "Valley Pike," and near the head-quarters of the army. Torbert was there, and I awaited his detailed instructions. Unavoidable delay ensued. Dispatches were to be sent, and they were not yet ready. An hour passed, and, meantime, the indistinct wagon-train was lightly and rapidly rolling away down the pike. The last wagon passed out of sight, and the rear-guard closed up behind it before I was ready to start. No other train was to go for four days. I must overtake this one or give up my journey. At length, accompanied by a single orderly, and my colored servant, George Washington, a contraband, commonly called "Wash," I started in pursuit of the train.

As I had nearly passed Newtown I overtook a small party apparently of the rear-guard of the train, who were lighting their pipes and buying cakes and apples at a small grocery on the right of the road, and who seemed to be in charge of a non-commissioned officer.

"Good-morning, Sergeant. You had better close up at once. The train is getting well ahead, and this is the favorite beat of Mosby."

"All right, Sir," he replied with a smile, and nodding to his men, they mounted at once and closed in behind me, while quite to my surprise I noticed three more of the party whom I had not before seen in front of me.

An instant's thought at once possessed me. I saw nothing to justify it, but I felt a presence of evil which I could not shake off. The men were in Union blue complete, and wore on their caps the well-known Greek cross which distinguishes the gallant Sixth Corp. They were young, intelligent, cleanly, and good-looking soldiers, armed with revolvers and Spencer's repeating carbine. I noticed the absence of sabres, but the presence of the Spencer, which is a comparatively new arm in our service, reassured me, and I thought it impossible that the enemy could as yet be possessed of them.

We galloped on merrily, and just as I was ready to laugh at my own fears, "Wash," who had been riding behind me and had heard some remark made by the soldiers, brushed up to my side, and whispered through his teeth chattering with fear,

"Massa, secesh sure! Run like de debbil!"

I turned to look back at three words, and saw six carbines leveled at me at twenty paces distant, and the Sergeant, who had watched every motion of the cigars, quietly forcing down his revolver from guard and the sharp command, "Halt. Surrender!"

We had reached a low place where the Opequon Creek crosses the pike, a mile from Newtown. The train was not a quarter of a mile ahead, but out of sight for the moment over the west ridge.

High stone walls lined the pike on either side, and a narrow bridge across the stream was in front of me and already occupied by the three rascals who had acted as advance-guard, and made a flank-and-rear movement which will never be effaced.

I had taken care to place myself between McCauley and Wash, and the moment the rebels began to snore and the sentry to nod over his pipe, we were in earnest and deep conversation.

McCauley proposed to mute our party and make a simultaneous rush for the carbines, and take our chances of stampeding the guard and escaping; but on passing the sentry found him quite awake, and three men were found willing to assent to it. As the odds were so largely against us, it was in vain to urge the risk.

The march began at an early hour the next morning, and I found myself directly up the Blue Ridge. We had emerged from the forest and descended about one-third of the height of the mountain, when I noticed a column of cavalry, about as like a map before us, showing plainly the lines of our army, its routes of supply, its foraging parties and its pickets, as the valley of the Loyal as distinctly as if we stood in one of its streets.

We now struck a wood path running southward and parallel with the crest of the mountain, along which we traveled for hours, with this wonderful panorama of forest and river, mountain and plain always in all the gorgeous beauty of the early autumn.

"This is a favorite promenade of mine," said Mosby. "I ride over to your parade-ground out their almost daily raids after me. There comes one of them now almost toward us. If you please we will ride down together and see them pass. It may be the last sight you will have of your old friends for some time," and, looking in the direction of his finger, I saw a squadron of my own regiment coming directly toward us on a road running under the foot of the mountain, and apparently on some foraging expedition down the valley. They passed within a half mile of us, under the mountain, while Mosby stood with folded arms on a rock above them.

Before noon we reached the road running through Manassas Gap, which place was held by about one hundred of Mosby's men, who signaled him as he approached, and here, much to my regret, the great guerrilla left us, bidding me a kindly good-by.

We were to pass through the gap and down the eastern side of the Blue Ridge, and by three o'clock reached Chester Gap, after passing which we descended to the valley, and were signaled him as he Sperryville on the direct line to Richmond.

Our guard was now reduced, as we are far within the Confederate lines, to seven men, including Wash and three men, and our party of eleven prisoners had seven horses among them. There was also a packhorse carrying our rations, forage, and some blankets. To the saddle of this pack-horse are strapped two Spencer carbines, muzzle downward, with their accouterments complete, including two well-filled cartridge-boxes.

I called Mack's attention to this fact as soon as the guard had dismounted, but he needed no second hint to comprehend it's full significance at once. He soon after dismounted, and when it came his turn to assist me, did so with apparent awkwardness, and the poorest and most broken-down horse of the party, with which he appeared to find it very difficult to keep up with the train, eventually succeeded in some mysterious way in laming.

He then dropped back to the Lieutenant in charge and modified the arrangements among his new horses for the pack-horse, and being particularly winning in his address, his request was at once granted, without a suspicion of the trap or a thought of the fatal carbines on the pack-saddle. I used some little skill in diverting the attention of the Lieutenant while Mack was so occupied; and as the train had begun to fall freely no one of the guard was particularly alert.

I was pleasantly gratified with the sight of Mack riding ahead on the pack-horse, with the two carbines still strapped to the saddle, but loosened, and well concealed by his heavy poncho, which he had spread as protection from the rain. These carbines were also equipped for mounting the spring apparatus by drawing out from the hollow stock a spiral spring, and dropping in the seven cartridges, one after the other, and then inserting the spring again behind them, which coils as it is pressed home, and by its elasticity forces the cartridges forward, one at a time, into the barrel at the successive movements of the lock.

I could see the movements of Mack's right arm by the sharp angle which it threw the poncho, and while guiding his horse with his left, looking the other way and chatting glibly with the other boys, he had dropped in the cartridges one after another, trotting his horse at the time to conceal the noise of their click, and finally forcing down the springs, and locking round at me with a look of the finest heroism and triumph I have ever beheld.

I nodded approval, and fearing he would precipitate matters, yet knowing that any instant might lead to discovery and be too late, I rode carelessly across the road to Brown, who was on foot, and, dismounting, asked him to lighten my girth, during which operation I told him the position of affairs as quickly as possible, and requested him to get up gradually by the side of Mack, communicate with him, and, at a signal from me, to seize one of the carbines and do his duty as a soldier if he valued his liberty.

Brown was terribly frightened and trembled like a leaf, but went immediately to his post, and I did not doubt would do his duty well.

I rode up again to the side of Lieutenant Whiting, and, like an echo from the past, came back to me my words of yesterday, "Possibly my turn may come to-morrow."

I engaged him in conversation, and, among other things, spoke of the prospect of sudden death as one always present in our army life, and the tendency it had to elicit heroism or ameliorate the character according to the quality of the individual.

He expressed the opinion which many held that a fatal train is made more horrible by it, and a refined and cultivated man is softened and made more refined by it.

We were on the immediate flank of Early's army. His cavalry was all around us. The road was thickly inhabited. It was almost night. We had passed a rebel picket but a mile back, and knew not how near another one or their camps might be.

The three rebel guards were riding in front of us and on our flanks, our party of prisoners was in the centre, and I was by the side of Lieutenant Whiting, who acted as rear-guard, when we entered a small grove of willow which for a moment screened the road. The hour was propitious. I gave the fatal signal and instantly threw myself from my saddle upon the Lieutenant, bringing him around the arms and dragging him from his horse, in the hope of securing his revolver, capturing him, and compelling him to yield me as a shield of the rebel line. At the same instant Mack raised one of the loaded carbines, and, in less time than I can write it, shot two of the guard in front of him, killing them instantly; and then coolly turning in his saddle, and seeing me struggling in the road with the Lieutenant, and the moment of obtaining the revolver apparently against me, he raised the carbine the third time; and as I strained the now desperate rebel to my breast, with his lifted face over my left shoulder, he shot him as directly between the eyes as he could have done if firing at a target at ten paces distance.

His bullet passed, and his ghastly corpse fell from my arms.

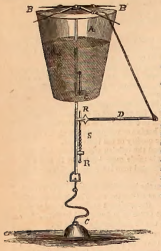
"Golly, Cap," said Mack, "I could have killed five or six more of them as well as not."

Brown had only wounded his man in the side, and added him to escape.

Our position was now perilous. Not a man of us knew the country, except its most general outlines. Our horses' wings could not be far away; the whole country would be alarmed in a few hours, darkness was intervening; and I doubted not that, before morning, the whole valley would be on our track. One half our party had already embraced, panic-stricken, at the first alarm, and every man for himself, scouring the country in every direction.

But five remained, including the faithful Wash, who had immediately displayed his special qualities by searching the bodies of the slain, and recovering therefrom, among other things, my gold huntingwatch from the person of Lieutenant Whiting, and over eleven hundred dollars in greenbacks, the proceeds, doubtless, of their various robberies of our men.

"Not quite nuff," said Wash, showing his ivories from ear to ear. "Dey vally dis nigger at two hundred dollars. I tink I ought to be worth more."

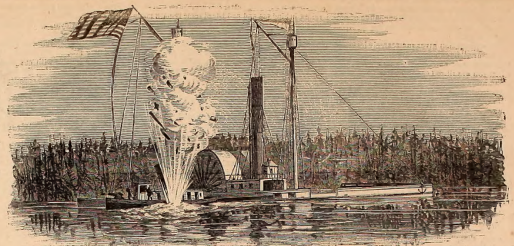


We instantly mounted the best horses, and, well armed with carbine and revolver, struck directly for the mountain on our right; his course being that would be the first place we should be sought for, soon changed our direction to the south, and rode for hours parallel toward the crest as rapidly as we could ride, and before complete darkness intervened we had made thirty miles from the place of action, and were then turning down up the mountain we rode as far as horses could climb, and, abandoning them, pushed on on foot through the whole night to the very summit of the Blue Ridge. Hence we could see the rebel camp-fires, and view their entire lines and position, just as daylight was breaking over the Valley.

The length of this weary day, and the terrible pangs of hunger and thirst which we suffered on this barren mountain, pertain to the more common experience of a soldier's life, and I need not describe them here.

We had to go still further south to avoid the scouts and pickets, and finally struck the Shenandoah opposite Front Royal, in the rear of Early's entire army, and there built a raft, and floated by night forty miles down that memorable stream, through the entire rebel army, until the glorious old flag once more hailed us a welcome.

THE REBEL COLONEL MOSBY.



JOHN SINGLETON MOSBY, long notorious as a rebel guerrilla, was born in Virginia in 1832. Little is popularly known of his career before the war. In 1853 he was a student at law in that State, and for his services in harassing our troops encamped near Fredericksburg met with General Lee's approval and was promoted Major. In March, 1863, he captured General STOUGHTON at Fairfax Court House. He was wounded near this same place in August of the same year while making his pow-pow in 1864, to resume his official duties. Last August he was again wounded and put hors du combat for two months, after which he again appeared in a raid on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, for which he was made Lieutenant-Colonel. December 10 he was given the full rank of Colonel. We give above an account, entitled "Two Days with Mosby," which, as being substantially true, will prove very interesting to our readers. This rebel Colonel has been the centre of a great deal of fabulous romance during the war. He has been recently reported captured, and seriously that his friends, it is reported, despair of his recovery.

A. Air-chamber.
D. Chamber containing the powder.
B, B. Cast-iron wheel made to fit over the top of the torpedo.
C. Anchor.

The torpedo is exploded by being struck with sufficient force to keel it over, which allows the wheel (B) to fall off, which in falling drags with it the rod (D), at the end of which is a small pin, which fits into a hole in the rod (R). The pin being pulled out releases the spiral spring (S) around the rod (R), which forces the rod against the bottom of the torpedo at F, where it strikes a cap and explodes the torpedo.

MR. R. C. GRIDLEY AND HIS SACK OF FLOUR.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY G. H. JOHNSON, SAN FRANCISCO.]

MR. GRIDLEY AND HIS SACK OF FLOUR.

MR. R. C. GRIDLEY, of Austin, Nevada, has invented a new method of raising the wind. Whatever else may be thought of it, it is at least successful. An election was lately held in Austin for city officers, on the result of which many wagers were laid. Mr. GRIDLEY bet with Doctor HERRICK, the wager consisting of a sack of flour, which the unsuccessful better was to carry on his shoulders through the streets of the town, to the tune of John Brown. Mr. GRIDLEY, having lost, was on hand the morning after the election to fulfill his promise. Preceded by a brass-band and followed by a crowd, he marched through the street with the flour-sack, weighing 50 pounds, on his shoulders, amidst the shouts of the populace. After formally giving the flour into Doctor HERRICK'S hands he suggested that the latter should donate it to the Sanitary Commission. The suggestion was followed and the sack was put up at auction, and, after a spirited competition, sold for $350. It was again donated to the Commission, and was purchased by GRIDLEY, HOBART, and JACOBS for $250. The process was repeated over and over again until the sum of $6000 in gold had been realized. Starting for San Francisco with the sack Mr. GRIDLEY, in less than a month, had realized $63,000 in gold. No lady's album in Nevada or California is considered complete without a photograph of GRIDLEY and his sack of flour. Mr. GRIDLEY, on December 13, left San Francisco, with his sack of flour, of course, for New York city, where fabulous sums are piled up, in anticipation of his arrival, for the benefit of the Sanitary Commission.

THE SOLE SURVIVOR OF A WRECK RESCUED.

ON the 10th of December Colonel MILFORD'S dispatch-boat, the Eliza Hancox, while on its way from Port Royal to Charleston, just as darkness was approaching, discovered off seaward a large fragment of a wreck. Upon making toward it a human being was seen moving upon it, and endeavoring to attract attention to his perilous situation. A boat was lowered, and the man having been brought on board and warmed, told a most thrilling story of the wreck of which he was the sole survivor.

His name was JOHN R. CRUSE, and he had been a hand on the R. B. Hoxlet, of Philadelphia, which had been recently anchored in the channel-way off Charleston, and used as a light-ship. Her crew consisted of the captain, JAMES BREWER, the mate, A. H. DUNN, and four hands. The vessel had been wrecked the previous night. At first her anchor was broken through the force of the gale, and she began to drift toward the northern bar. It was not long before she struck and went to pieces. CROSS managed to get on a piece of the poop-deck with DEAN, the mate, and the two were carried out to sea, being frequently washed off from their frail raft by the breakers off Stono Inlet. DEAN having been bruised on the head by a plank when he was thrown into the water, survived only a short time. CROSS, availing himself of his companion's clothing, lashed the corpse to the wreck, having under consideration the necessity which might arise of his having to feed upon the poor mate's body. When he was rescued he had been already thirty-two hours without food.

HUMORS OF THE DAY

CHEMISTRY SIMPLIFIED FOR YOUNG BEGINNERS.

How to make a Light in a Dark Room.—First darken the room. Then take of spirits of wine, 3 oz.; and shellac, 2 oz. Mix well together, and place them on the floor in the centre of the room. Procure a red-hot poker; apply it to the mess. This will soon light the compound.

How to Bore a Hole in a Piece of Iron.—Take about two feet wrought-iron gas-pipe, and a piece of boiler-plate. Get your mother's best velvet mantle. Take about two pounds of nitric acid, put them into the mantle in basin of water; if they don't believe you, set a hole right through. Pour it on the velvet. It will bore a hole right through it. This will gladden your mother's heart.

How to Make Fireworks at Home.—Take of one bundle, about two tablespoonfuls, skyrockets one pound, blank cartridges one at least. Wrap them into a paper parcel. Make the company stand round with their heads in a row. Put the parcel to any nervous old gentleman and tell him to put it in the fire. It will go off of its own accord. company. and remember not to stand in the room. Don't try this experiment more than twice a day.

COUNSEL TO THE POOR.

When hands and money all are spent
Take a large house, and don't pay rent.

"Poor Dick! how sadly he is altered since his marriage!" remarked one friend to another. "Why, my dear sir, replied the other: "directly a man's neck is in the nuptial noose, every one must see that he's a haltered person."

RIDDLES FOR THE RECKLESS.

ANTE BAN.—Why is any aunt superior to the person who shares your bedroom? Because a lady's barrier, while she is in Harriet.

HARTSHORN.—Where would you find a word that should suggest to Richard II. that he had best avoid Bolingbroke? —In the Dick-shun-ary.

A TRIFLER.—Why should wife-beating receive light punishment?—Because it's a mark-a-ble offence.

WORRIED.—Why do we expect more from a Worrier?—Because he's a worrier.

WHY NOT?—When can't you believe Truth?—When she lies at the bottom of a well.

NOTES AND QUERIES.

Note.—A Man is a fuller position frequently consults his fi-diction. A Woman in similar circumstances is prompted to put herself in communication with her Mirror.

Query.—Does it follow that Woman is superior to Man, because she is more addicted to looking-glasses?

Note.—In the race of life, a gallant Sportsman has observed, Woman has the favorite canter off all the cups and plates.

Note.—Philosophers, perplexed to give a satisfactory definition of Woman, have gratuitously pronounced her a puzzle.

Query.—Will this ingenious suggestion account for her feeling so much pleasure in taking a rival to pieces?

THE FATHER SAINT OF AUCTIONEERS.—St. Francis de Sales.

LOVE SONG.

We met amid the glittering crowd,
We danced, I tore thine ample skirt,
And then we sat and fervent vowed,
Demanded why I would not flirt:
The fiddles ceased, we let me shrink
From this avowal fair and true.
Thou hast a wife, and think me
She's a much nicer girl than you.

A man who had recently become a votary to Bacchus, returned home one night in an unmistakable state of bewilderment. Think of me, he was unfortunately drunk, but perfectly conscious of his unfortunate situation. Knowing that his wife was asleep, he decided to attempt gaining his bed without disturbing her, and by sleeping off his drunkenness, escape censure from her altogether. He reached the door of his room without disturbing her, and thought it promising to be successful on his mission. He thought it he could reach the bedpost, and hold on to that while he slipped off his coat, the fact would be easily accomplished. Unfortunately for his scheme, a cruelly stool in a direct line with the bedpost, shot the middle of the floor. Of course, when his stolen cause in contact with the aforesaid piece of furniture, he pitched over it with perfect looseness; and upon gaining an erect position, ere an equilibrium was established, he went over it backward in an equally unsavory manner. Again he struggled to his feet, and was favored with the bower of ribbon beside me. At length, with the fifth fall, his patience became exhausted, and he resolved not yet to be overcome. In desperation he cried out to his sleeping partner, "Wife! wife! how many times you get in the house? I've fallen over five, and here's another before me!"

FOR A CHILD.

Sweet eyes spoken to,
Suck when you're child,
Buy me shoes,
Make kiss!

DARLING DAUGHTER. "Oh, Pa, what'f you think? Mr. Sandwich is coming!"

PAPA. "Well! the old——"

DAUGHTER. "Hush—oh, Pa! Since she's Reading, I mean—engaged to whatever you call it, you know!"

The following notice is displayed in a confectioner's window in a West-end street of London: "Stock Parlor, and all kinds of cakes, including legged baby" (a leg). In the very centre of the most civilized capital of Europe!

PRETTY INNOCENCE.

"Ma, dear, has Papa any bachelor uncles?"
"No, my boy; why, Hannah, dear, pray what mean your terms?
For you said just before his last gift, three carbuncles,
He was too fond of seeing his bachelor haunts!"

An advertisement appeared recently, promising, for a consideration, the secret of long life. Many applied, and got this answer for their money: "Get elected a member of the French Academy. They all attain a great age." Here followed a list of the members, and their ages.

Tactics say that pearls were common in his time. Forty per unit would probably be met with, here, rare. The best kinds are, a good wife, a thorough cob, a bottle of forty port, and a perfect benefactor.

A misanthropist enjoys the corruption of human nature as an epicure enjoys long-kept and inhaled venison.

FOOR RICHARD IMPROVED.

He who must earn before he dine,
Ought to be called at half past nine;
He who has tick at "Cock" or "Chicken,"
Need not get up until he pleases.

Does it soothe the feelings of a photographer, when he receives a positive refusal from a lady, that she gives him a negative?

CHEST-FALLEN.—A lady who had made a fortune by confectionery applied to the Lord Mayor for relief, on the ground that she was prohibited on being told that they could only give her a—lozenge.

NEW PROVERB.

Early to bed and early to rise
Is the way to feel stupid and have red eyes.

REMEMBERING ON A JOKE.—A tectotaler, living not far from Cockermouth, has grown prosperous, and is now Mr. Spencer, because he is the only one in whom he can find "the well of English undefiled."

FIGHT Marriages are not yet done away with—at least a great number of people who get married regret they were not slower about it.

A POEM ON A VERY FAT PARTY.

DEAR COPID hath no sorrow that
Could reach my heart through all thy fat:
But should one power pierce me,
A flame, then dot perish in the blaze!

The best house to spend the 21st of December in is a schoolmaster's, because there you are sure of having the great number of people who get married regret they were not slower about it.

A LINE FOR LENT.—A fast day is the stomach's birthday.

HOW TO KEEP A BEDROOM.—Keep it to yourself.

What sort of a marriage should you say that is which a man makes whose name is Morgan, and who lives in a garret? A Morgunatic marriage.

MATRIMONY.

A couple sat beside the fire,
Debating which should first retire.
The husband softly popped the question,
"Wife, you should go and warm the bed."
"I never will," the quick reply,
"I did so once, and nearly died."
"And I will not be outdone," the spouse,
With firmer tone and lowering brows.
And thus it went for half an hour,
Continuing till they nearly froze.
When both grew tired and suffering agher
Around the feebly glimmering fire,
They trimmed the dying embers,
As though the spar had seized their members.
Resolved, like Christian prior to yield,
But force each other from the field.
And thus they spent the evening pair
In silence shook and shivered there.
Until the clock struck twelve at last,
And cocks were crowing for the dawn!
When all at once the husband cried,
"Wife, hadn't we better go to bed?"

EVERY BODY'S SOURCE—Adam and Eve.

MEDICAL ADVICE—"Throw physic to the dogs!"

Burning houses are a serious matter, but they should be played upon.

A "MONOPOLITICAL CIRCLE"—A hole to creep though!!

A single man would scorch a pin-cushion for treason, and set fire to a conspiracy.

A great many households, like ancient Rome, suffer greatly from the Tarkins.

REAL POVERTY.—An Irish barrister, when he first domiciled in Liverpool, was troubled with "sirens" to serve writings" and his wife, who had preceded his poverty as follows: "When I first came to Liverpool I was in perfect rags; the tailors refused to trust me, and how could I stock my head through; and I had to have that my only shirt, washed by the dozen, for it was in twelve pieces."

PETROLEUM

THE New York and Liverpool Petroleum Company, whose advertisement appears elsewhere, offers unrivaled guarantees of safety and good management in the fact that it is so largely owned and conducted by real men of oil—not mere speculators in corporations. Mr. Anger, one of its trustees, belongs to the Titusville firm of Brewer, Watson, & Co., whose wealth counts by millions. Mr. Myers, another, is an extensive well-proprietor and oil-shipper; and others, we might speak, "live and move and have their being" in oil. Such features show that a company is real, and meant for permanence.

DYSPEPSIA and FITS.

A SURE CURE for these distressing complaints is now made known in a Treatise on Foreign and Native Herbal Preparations, published by Dr. O. Phelps Brown. The prescription was furnished him in such a providential manner that he can not conscientiously refuse to make it known, as it has cured every body who has used it, never having failed in a single case. It is equally sure in cases of Fits as of Dyspepsia, and the ingredients may be found in any drug store. Sent free to all on the receipt of five cents to prepay postage. Address Dr. O. PHELPS BROWN, No. 19 Grand Street, Jersey City, New Jersey.

Sudden Death

Never occurred but from causes which a single dose of BRANDRETH'S PILLS could have removed. When humors accumulate, preventing the healthy current of the blood, the remedy must be at once applied. There is no time for the calling of a physician. So let the wise have on hand. A single dose will often save life. The sleep that follows is the sleep of health, not of death.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box, enveloped in full directions. Purchase none unless my PRIVATE GOVERNMENT STAMP is on the box. See upon it B. BRANDRETH M. D.

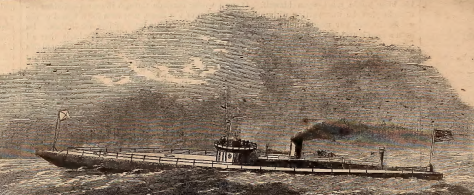
HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. IX.—No. 422.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 28, 1865. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1865, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.



THE HON. WILLIAM DENNISON.

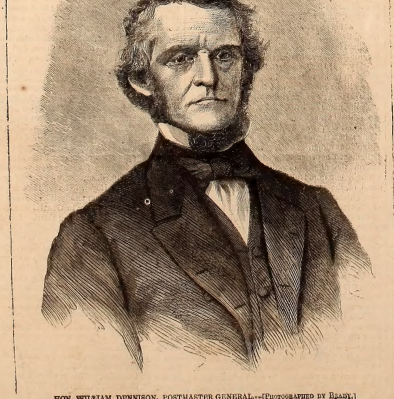
WILLIAM DENNISON was appointed Postmaster-General of the United States upon the resignation of MONTGOMERY BLAIR, of Maryland, September 24, 1864, and entered upon the discharge of his duties on the 1st day of October. He was born at Cincinnati on the 23d of November, 1815. On his mother's side he was of New England ancestry. His father was a native of New Jersey. In the year 1835 Mr. DENNISON graduated at Miami University, then a leading educational institution of the West. Mr. DENNISON pursued the study of law at Cincinnati, and was admitted to the bar in 1840. Mr. DENNISON soon after removed to Columbus, where he practiced his profession until 1848, when the Whigs of his district elected him to the Ohio Senate. His record as a Senator associates him with the repeal of the Ohio statutes denying colored persons the privileges of residence and of testimony in courts. His first public speech, in 1844, opposed the scheme for the extension of slavery involved in the admission of Texas into the Union; and his public acts and speeches have from that time to the present been consistent with the record thus early established.

In 1850 Mr. DENNISON retired from politics, though he was an ardent advocate of General SCOTT for President in 1852. About this time he began to turn his attention to the great railroad enterprises then being projected in the State.

Upon the inauguration of the Republican party Mr. DENNISON earnestly espoused its political creed, and in 1859 he was nominated as the Republican candidate for Governor of Ohio, and was elected.

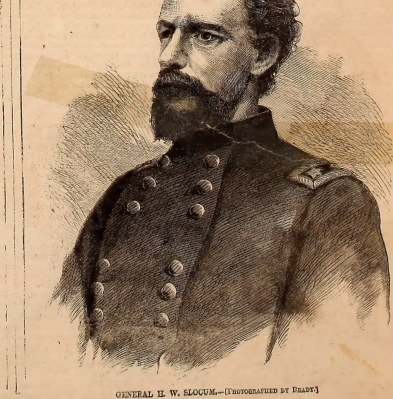
When rebellion was declared by force of arms in April, 1861, Ohio, in all its departments of Government, was prepared to execute promptly the will of its people. The General Assembly had not adjourned. At his suggestion three millions of dollars were voted to protect Ohio from invasion or insurrection, and to sustain the Government against the rebels; additional military power was conferred upon the executive, and authority was granted for the immediate organization of troops for State defense. The response of Ohio to the call of President LINCOLN for 75,000 troops, and her prompt and generous responses to all subsequent calls by the General Government for aid against rebellion, form a prominent feature in the history of the war for the Union. Having organized nine regiments of infantry, two squadrons of cavalry, and one battery of artillery as State troops, under State law, Governor DENNISON appointed GEORGE B. MCCLELLAN, Major-General, to command them.

THE OCEAN MONITOR "DICTATOR."



In the execution of his duties as Governor Mr. DENNISON never consulted his own ease. He was always prompt, energetic, and judicious in his official acts, and his administration was entirely satisfactory to the people of the State. Mr. DENNISON was Chairman of the Baltimore Convention in 1864. The appointment by the President of Mr. DENNISON to his present position is peculiarly fitting, and the country may be assured that he will honestly and industriously perform the duties to which he has been called as Postmaster-General.

GENERAL H. W. SLOCUM.



MAJOR-GENERAL H. W. SLOCUM, who commanded the left wing of SHERMAN'S army in its recent advance through Georgia, originally entered the war as Colonel of the Twenty-seventh New York Volunteers. This regiment left Elmira, one thousand strong, for Washington July 10, 1861. On August 9 of that year he was, at the same time with Colonel BERNIES, promoted to the rank of Brigadier-General. In the early portion of the war he was connected with the Virginia campaigns. In HOOKER'S Fredericksburg campaign General SLOCUM commanded the Twelfth Corps. At that time General HOWARD was also connected with the Army of the Potomac, commanding the Eleventh Corps. HOWARD now commands the three corps comprising the Army of the Tennessee. General SLOCUM'S record in the West has been a brilliant one. He took a prominent part in SHERMAN'S Atlanta campaign last summer, and was the first to enter the city after its evacuation by HOOD. He had in the mean time succeeded General HOOKER in the command of the Twentieth Corps. General SHERMAN, by intrusting to him the left column of his advancing army in the march through Georgia, gave him a confidence which was richly deserved, and which results have fully justified.

THE "DICTATOR."

THE ocean Monitor Dictator is an iron-clad ram, 4,033 tons, and carrying two guns. Her length is 224 feet, breadth 50, and depth 22. She was built by C. H. DELAMATER, at the Delamater Iron Works, New York City, from drawings and plans by JOHN ERICSSON. Her keel was laid in September, 1862, and an attempt to launch her on the 28th of November, 1863, failed. A month afterward she was successfully launched. She is the largest of our iron-clads, except the Dunderberg, and takes part in the second attempt against Fort Fisher.

LETTERS FROM SHERMAN'S ARMY.

Five hundred thousand evangels
Sent to a million hearts
With the messages of triumph
In the strength which love imparts;

Sent to the gray-haired fathers
With a second gift of time,
To turn back their failing moments
Into the years of prime;

Sent to dim-sighted mothers
With realm of years gone by,
To witness the work accomplished,
And sweeten the time to die;

Sent to the fair child-brothers
With the might of the sword and pen,
And the prophecy of conquest
When they shall be bearded men;

Sent to unweary sisters
As the mystic-lined device,
Whereon is the recognition
Of their glory of sacrifice;

Sent to the wife and children,
Dearer than life's sweet breath,
With the holy lesson of duty
That looks in the eyes of death.

The volumes of sage and scholar
Grow lifeless and dim beside
The life of these winged letters
And their meaning glorified.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 28, 1865.

GENERAL BUTLER.

GENERAL BUTLER has made a grave mistake. In his farewell order to the Army of the James he says: "I have refused to order useless sacrifices of the lives of such soldiers; and I am relieved of your command." Does he really believe that he has been removed because he would not slaughter his soldiers? He is unjust to himself and to the Government in permitting himself to utter such an insinuation.

Of the gallantry, ability, and energy of General BUTLER there can be no doubt. But of the fact that, from Great Bethel to Wilmington, the purely military movements which he has directed have not been successful there is also no doubt. Certainly it is no shame to so effective a military governor that he should be proved to be no soldier. A man's qualities, however eminent, are not necessarily equal in every direction; and his removal from a military command is really no more discreditable to him than the withdrawal from the chair of mathematics of a professor who had no taste for algebra.

When the war began, and there was an imperative need of soldiers, they were not to be found. The few regularly-educated officers were all employed, while the demand for thousands more was unsatisfied. The Government was compelled, therefore, to call civilians to the service; and those who had the requisite intelligence, fidelity, capacity, and promptness, and who from their antecedents and positions were likely to inspire general confidence, were naturally and properly selected. Among such no one was more conspicuous than General BUTLER. He was the earliest hero of the war. His decision and comprehension and rapidity gave us Annapolis and Baltimore; but they were more suited to military victories. When FARRAGUT took New Orleans the same qualities made General BUTLER an unsurpassed head of the government of that city. But in all these instances he shone by the force of his executive and administrative skill rather than by distinctive military superiority. Yet such was the public admiration of his services and capacity that his recall from New Orleans and his replacement by General BANKS were felt to be misfortunes.

That his campaign before Petersburg was a public disappointment will not be denied. That he had not cut off reinforcements from Richmond, as he supposed, is clear; and that the subsequent military operations in his department, down to the failure at Wilmington, have not been successful, is indisputable. It is merely the truth to say that the public faith in his purely military ability is shaken, and that his retirement from a purely military command can not be considered a public misfortune. The war has winnowed our soldiers. The genius of GRANT, SHERMAN, THOMAS, and SHERIDAN has been established. Their names certify success. But when the reverse is the case, there can be no general complaint of the mere fact of removal.

It is very foolish and untrue, therefore, to speak of the removal of General BUTLER as in itself a disgrace. It is no more disgraceful to him than it would be to General GRANT to be found out of place on a ship of the line. Nor is it just or wise to assume that his removal is due to any kind of jealousy. When there are fair and obvious reasons for an action, there is no need of assuming foul and obscure ones. If THOMAS, or SHERIDAN, or SHERMAN were removed from military command at this time the country would justly demand to know the reasons, and there might well be suspicion of intrigue or doubtful purpose. But with the military career of General BUTLER plainly before us it is not difficult to see that his removal does not necessarily imply discredit either to himself or to the Government.

Every friend of General BUTLER must regret the words we have quoted from his farewell order, and every enemy of his and the country will smile. That he has always been peculiarly obnoxious to rebels and Copperheads and foreign foes was his glory. Such has been the profoundest homage to his patriotism and efficiency. He never pleased them when in command, and it is only the more painful that he should gratify them in retiring. When he accuses the Government of removing him because he would not slaughter his soldiers he purposely insults it, and makes his recall in active service very difficult. Even if he felt that he could no longer remain upon terms with the Administration, he should have remembered how surely his fling would react upon himself. If he thought that he was partaking with all active service in the war magnanimity would have been a final laurel.

THE WHIRRING OF DOVES.

THE air is full of the cooing of doves and the rustle of olive boughs. Mr. BLAIR has flown to Richmond as Mr. GREELEY flew to Niagara Falls. It is to be seen whether the cooing of the one is more effective than that of the other.

So far as we can understand what the doves propose, it is to ascertain whether a true peace be now attainable. But how is that to be done by unofficial visits to JEFFERSON DAVIS, and how often are they to be made? To say that we ought to spare no effort to secure peace that the war is to be stopped is idle, because we do spare no effort, and we interpose no bar. The Government has said and repeated the terms upon which peace is offered. Do the doves numbers one or two any new terms to offer?

"But we ought to strive," says DOVE PARKER, of New Jersey, "to let the deluded people of the South understand that there is no question of subjugation by the North, but that the Union and the Constitution are the sole objects of the war." Certainly we ought to strive. But it to be done? Clearly not by any number of unofficial doves fluttering about the eaves of the Spottswood House in Richmond. Such embassies can serve no possible purpose. FOR DAVIS will naturally say, if you do not come from your Government we decline to declare upon what terms we will treat with you. As he did say, so to JAQUESS and KIRKE, that his first condition is independence, how does any one know that he speaks for the Confederate people, on the other hand, that he might not say something else to official bearers of the olive?

If the doves wish to inform the people of the South what the purposes of the United States Government is, let them ask the President to repeat officially what he has incessantly reiterated. Or, if they wish to satisfy some people at the North that the rebels will listen to nothing but separation, why are those people more likely to believe Mr. BLAIR than Col. JAQUESS? If the intention of the doves is to inform the Government is not resolved to hear no proposition of peace, certainly an unofficial offer to hear what DAVIS has to say will not be so convincing as the plain statement of the Government itself, officially made by the President, of the terms upon which peace is possible.

For we suppose that peace is to be settled. Peace is possible only when the rebels lay down their arms, and submit to the laws, and leave all differences between the citizens and Government of the United States to constitutional arbitration. Are not those terms imperative? If they are, what does it matter what terms DAVIS has to propose? If they are, how can the Southern people and Europe learn them except by official notification, and not by private interviews?

The infinite mischief is done by this well-intentioned project, that it implies that the Government is remiss in informing itself of the possibilities of peace; that it is resolved to prefer its own to some unknown terms, and consequently the effort increases the very doubt and dissatisfaction which it proposes to allay. Moreover, it can not fail to suggest to the rebels and to Europe that the Government is afraid of a war which it is constantly trying in an underhand way to stop; and if tired, then concious of weakness or of a doubtful cause.

The doves are very obliging, but the eagle is quite competent to conclude and confirm peace.

A BEGGING CRESUS.

THE great corporation of the State, the New York Central Railroad Company, has applied to the Legislature for permission to increase its rates of fare; in other words, to be paid more highly for its utterly inadequate accommodation of travelers, for its enormous and profitable through freight transport, and for its curious and constant disregard of the interests of the trade of the State of New York.

The business of this road, which appears in the light of a mendicant asking for public charity, transcends its utmost capacity to perform, and its profits are proportionate. Its line groans with the incessant passage of cars. The Sabbath air hums with its ponderous traffic. The wretched sheds in which it huddles its passengers are thronged by them all day and all night, wearily waiting for the trains delayed for hours and hours by the vast weight and length caused by the crowds of travelers who make the best shift they can. Meanwhile the warehouses of traders along the route are piled with merchandise which there is no means of carrying. Merchants buy and sell at one point, return home to another, and vainly wait days after weak fire a chance to send or to receive their goods. The through Western freight is so immense that the way freight along the line of the road is sacrificed, although the road was built to accommodate the State of New York. One of the officers of the road lately remarked that it had not half power enough to do its work.

And this Company, staggering under this vast business, so pressed with it that it has not means enough to do it, a great monopoly of the whole winter carriage through the most populous region of the State, now asks for a repeal of the law by which its rates of fare are limited. Its hunger grows by feeding. It pleads that all prices have risen. If they had fallen, would this modest Company have asked that its rates might be reduced? That it needs any such succor to save it from actual loss is a ludicrous joke to those who know what persons and influences control the road. The object is to get a firmer hold of larger profits, at the expense of the people of the State and of all who travel upon it.

The power of the Central Railroad as a political engine is enormous. It has not quite subdued the State to itself as the Camden and Amboy has the State of New Jersey; but its direct political influence, not to say coercion, is known. It is one of the demoralizing powers of the State, and, it is no untruth to say, attempts to carry its ends in the Legislature by means which it would be folly to confess. If it does not directly or indirectly bribe, it is as much maligned as it is modest.

If it is impossible to prevent the Company from levying another daily tax upon the traveling part of the public, we humbly hope that at least some conditions may be imposed with the privilege; as, for instance, that a certain per-centage of the local freight shall be regularly transported; that decent and sufficient station-houses shall replace the bleak and shameful sheds at Albany, Utica, Syracuse, and other points; that the new patent brake and raised-roof car shall be substituted for those now often used; that the conductor shall be forced to furnish every passenger a seat or to refund the fare, and, in general, that this towering corporation, which exists by the public consent and is supported by the public necessities, shall be compelled to conduct itself as what it is, the servant and not the master of the people of New York.

THE POPE'S BULL.

KING CAROLE sat upon the shore and commanded the sea to retire, but he had the good sense to command in person. Pope PIUS NINTH orders the tide back again, and really believes it will withdraw. His late letter is both one of the most amusing and the most humiliating performances of modern times. It is a bull against Protestantism. It is an edict against civilization. Every man who daily recalls the worn-out old house-dogs who sleep in the sun, infirm, toothless, and voiceless, who open their eyes lazily, wag their tails, and feebly go through the motions of barking, for they can do no more. But here is an old guardian who opens his eyes languidly, and growls at the sun traveling up the sky. He growls at the time of day, and affects to bark at the inevitable hours.

It will be nineteen years in June since Cardinal MASTAI FERRETTI was elected Pope, and took the name of PIUS NINTH. His accession was hailed as a new era. GREGORY SIXTEENTH, the old Pope, was a bigot, a narrow-minded tyrant; but it was implied that "Pius the Nono" was a man of such generous nature and enlightened experience that he would not only reform the abuses of administration in the Church, but would gladly place himself at the head of the most intelligent party in it, and adapt himself and the Church to the conditions of the times, in which it might still be a real power and retain the confidence and love of its wisest children. He began by some political amnesties of a doubtful character. He received from the Vatican to the Quirinal. Both acts were hailed as of the best augury, and during the first year of his reign the popular homage to the Pope was almost equal to the present adoration of GARIBALDI. There was even a hint of a constitution, and so good and just he seemed and even then so powerful possible.

Then came the French revolution of 1848, and all was over. A blanker disappointment than the succeeding years of his reign was never known. In the hands of ANTONELLI, an unscrupulous priest, he has been a passive instrument of reaction, until at last he fulminates—if so Gregorian a word may be used to describe a bleat instead of a roar—this melancholy protest against the activity of the human mind.

The Pope's encyclical letter of the 8th of December, 1864, is a resumé of all his denunciations against religious and political liberty, with a fresh effort "to destroy new opinions." The poor old gentleman in Rome sighs for the rack, and sobs for thumb-screws. It is a wicked error, he exclaims, that the civil power ought not to punish religious heresy. My excellent predecessor, GREGORY, he cries, declared that the doctrine of the right of every man to liberty of conscience and of worship is a "delirium," and I say Amen! Freedom of speech and common schools are no better. And why indeed should we wonder that a pontiff whose power depends upon intellectual darkness should complain of increasing light? That public opinion should have any weight whatever he declares to be a monstrous heresy. And why should he not say so of public opinion, since he knows what public opinion says of him?

The reason of the expiring power of the great institution that once controlled Christendom is nowhere more fully manifested than in this letter. It proposes to deal with man in the world, and it refuses to understand either. It is like a parent who does not see that his son at thirty years old is not his son of two years, and who threatens him with the dark closet and the rod if he does not go to bed at sunset. Meanwhile the thoughtful men of the Church of which the Pope is chief bishop—men who know and delight in the inevitable progress of the race and the amelioration of its condition—must be confounded by this futile and foolish wail. If today they are met and told by the highest authority they recognize that religious liberty is a naughty chimera, that honest differences of opinion ought to be punished by the brute force of the strongest, that governments existing by popular consent are contrary to the divine purpose, and that education is pernicious to the spiritual welfare of man, they can only hang their heads, and, as they are more or less heroic, decide either that the infallible head of the Church is the most foolish of mortals, or that he is miraculously allowed to say what common sense forbids. There is nothing which the best and wisest have urged against the inevitable moral and intellectual tendency of the Romish Church which is not justified by the Pope's encyclical letter.

SHERMAN'S FREEDMEN.

EVERY great military success upon our side brings equally great responsibilities. None of them is more obvious, more pressing, than the condition of the freedmen in the States which we occupy, or who flock to our lines. Their coming is natural and inevitable. Even the opponents of what is called the emancipation policy have always agreed that the march of our armies would free the slaves. Those opponents are men, and they know very well that they themselves would rather take the chances of liberty than the certainties of slavery. It was hoped, it was known, that SHERMAN's great march would bring thousands of slaves with it. It has done so. Did we think, also, how we should be ready to receive them?

After SHERMAN reached Savannah he sent this message to Secretary STANTON at Beaufort, with a ship-load of negroes: "Please find inclosed seven hundred contrabands, the first installment of fifteen thousand. Many of them are from far up in Georgia, and a long, weary, and sorrowful tramp they have had. Many of them with little children have not brought a thing with them, and have seen miserable doings. Bales of clothing could be disposed of among them." On Christmas-Day the agent of the National Freedmen's Relief Association at Beaufort was called upon to prepare for three several hundred, mostly old men, women, and children, who would arrive within an hour. Half of them had come from Atlanta, Georgia, and even Chattanooga. They were intelligent and healthy, but footsore and weary. They were utterly without blankets, stockings, and shoes. Among the seven hundred there were not fifty pairs of textiles for cooking, no axes, and few coverings for the head. The agents of the Association at once set vigorously to work, and the unfortunates housed in a dismsed commissary building through the rainy night that followed.

The next morning four hundred more sent off properly provided, and were encamped upon the island of Port Royal, to be scattered among the plantations as soon as possible. What little superintendence was needed in Mr. STANTON's hands were distributed among them. But the agent reports that there are no stockings, no children's clothing, no cloth for shirts or petticoats, no needles or thread to make them. The blankets are almost gone. Through exposure two hundred of the four hundred are sick; and boots like respect could reach officers of the association in New York, the agent says that from three to five thousand more, equally destitute, will arrive to join his settled colony.

The story is its own appeal. These people are thrown upon our care. We can not avoid it if we would. The most needed supplies are cooking utensils, axes, large and heavy shoes, wool socks and stockings, heavy pantaloons, petticoats, children's dresses of all kinds, blankets, thread, and needles. Money may be sent to JOSEPH B. COLLINS, Treasurer, 40 Wall Street; goods and clothing to C. C. LEIGH, 1 Mercer Street, New York.

If so generously and properly we send supplies to those who were lately our enemies, to those whom devotion to slavery occasioned the war, can we forget the innocent people who, as they have been the bruised victims of the long peace of slavery, are now the patient victims of the war of liberty?

THE FALL OF FORT FISHER.

THE history of the Wilmington Expedition is another proof of our Lieutenant-General's indomitable pertinacity. He never undertook without final accomplishment. He may not succeed in the first instance, or a partial reverse may reveal to him the insufficiency in the means taking or the incompetency of his subordinates. But he holds on notwithstanding, providing new means and shelving incapable officers, knowing that in the end, sooner or later, victory awaits the patient soldier.

BUTLER failed to take Fort Fisher, and men had hardly got through with reasoning upon his failure and its cause before the news of complete success, under another commander, upsets or modifies their military critiques. This success is of the first importance. The capture of Fort Fisher does not mean alone the taking of 75 guns and several hundred prisoners. It involves a loss to the rebels of their principal port, and to us whatever gain may result from the release of our blockading fleet at this point. But its chief value is in relation to the future military operations of Generals GRANT and SHERMAN. The Cape Fear River is a convenient base for the most efficient co-operation of the two great armies now overshadowing the Atlantic rebel States.

The assault made on the 15th, and the five hours' fight hand to hand with the garrison of the fort, is not surpassed in the annals of war. The three divisions of AMES'S division—CURTIS'S, PENNYBACKER'S, and BELL'S—covered themselves with glory. Every one of the brigade commanders was wounded—two of them dangerously. Our loss, estimated at nearly one thousand, indicates the terrible sharpness of the fight. Two hundred of these were wounded by the bursting of a magazine after the fort was captured.

There was perfect harmony between the two parts of the expedition, and it is hard to say which deserves the most honor—PORTER for his effective bombardment, or TERRY for his skilful disposition of the land-force and conduct of the assault.

EDWARD EVERETT.

MR. EVERETT died as his warmest friends would have wished—quietly, painlessly, in his own home, and in the ripeness of his powers, his services, and his fame. He was our most eminent private citizen, and his death is doubly happy that it occurs when his lofty fidelity to the country has disarmed criticism and silenced the early faith of many who had been long estranged by the timidity of his political course at a time when timidity seemed almost treachery.

He was a singularly fortunate man from the beginning. A brilliant collegian; a fascinating young clergyman; a conspicuous public man, Representative, Governor, Ambassador, Senator, Secretary of State; an accomplished scholar and President of the University at Cambridge; a persuasive and polished orator, whose speeches are works for students and statesmen; and self-devoted to a fair but futile mission of sentimental unrest; a copious, learned, delightful, and even humorous writer, with no single literary monument of his varied scholarship and skill; cold, cautious, exact, punctual, proper, but gentle, courteous, genial, and serene; loving praise and sensitive to blame, yet never stung by it into vituperation or fiery retort, he passed from shining point to point of popular fame, not a man of the heroic mould by which states are founded or saved, but of that grace and refinement and gentleness by which they are truly adorned; and to him who has threescore and ten years well fulfilled, with the words of patriotic sympathy warm upon his lips, honored by the nation and beloved by his countrymen, beatus ille, to the end.

SKATING.

OATMAN AND VAN DYKE'S Skating Pond, on the Fifth Avenue between Fifty-eighth and Fifty-ninth streets, is one of the chief attractions this winter. The ice is kept in excellent condition, the Police arrangements are satisfactory, and for children and ladies it is the safest place known to us. Colonel OATMAN himself is always present to supervise, and deserves the thanks of all lovers of the sublime art of skating for his energy and enterprise in providing this pond.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE SITUATION.

A VERY important measure passed the Senate last week, having for its end the repeal of the Reciprocity Treaty. This is not occasioned by the late difficulties arising out of the St. Albans' raid. The measure has been unsought, and is purely deprive the Government of a large revenue which would otherwise accrue. The Constitutional Amendment is still under consideration in the House. The debate has been conducted with moderation, and the issue has been very narrow scope for so important a subject.

The military situation has been again modified by a great victory. The fortifications on Federal Point, commanding the mouth of Cape Fear River, have been reduced by Admiral Porter and General Terry. Fort Fisher has been taken without a siege. This most important success secures two results—first, the closing of the port of Wilmington against blockade-runners; and second, an excellent base of military operations for General Sherman's army.

CONGRESS.

January 10:

In the Senate, the Deficiency bill was passed. The Consular bill was reported from the House.

In the House, a resolution was adopted directing the Military Committee to inquire into and report what legislation is necessary to secure to persons arrested and imprisoned by the military authorities a prompt examination into the cause of their arrest, and their discharge if there is no reason, or later evidence, for their arrest. The debate on the constitutional amendment was resumed.

January 11:

In the Senate, the resolution to repeal the Reciprocity Treaty was discussed at length. The principal speech against the resolution was Mr. Hale's. He said that the general operation of the treaty had been disastrous. The exports to Canada had within a few years increased from 12 cents per head to twenty-five dollars. Both free and dutypaying goods had increased. In 1853 the exports to Canada were $7,600,000; in 1854, $15,000,000; in 1860, $22,000,000; and in 1863, $28,000,000. The imports had increased from $800,000 to $30,000,000. The Senator thought not to strike a blow at commerce when we need the money to carry on the war. It would be a direct encouragement to the rebels and weaken the Union cause to repeal the treaty. Mr. Sumner replied to Mr. Hale. He said the treaty might be seen under four different heads. It concerns the Solicitor, the navigation of the St. Lawrence, the commerce between the United States and the British Provinces, and the revenue of the United States. Each head, and to the forcible share was a plain advantage, because the treaty secured tranquillity on the frontier, which was a great attraction. As to the navigation of the St. Lawrence the concession was great, as it was that to which Canada attached most importance. During the first six years of the treaty only forty vessels, measuring 7,000 tons, passed from the ocean through the St. Lawrence; and during the same time only nineteen went up to Montreal. The navigation was in the same open highway. There are very petty sources when we consider the value of the commerce on the lakes, which, in 1856, was $58,787,320; or when we consider the carrying trade between the United States and the British Provinces. Take the years 1857 to 1863, inclusive, and we shall find that the tonnage of the vessels entered in the United States which cleared for the British Provinces was 10,027,330 tons, and the tonnage of vessels entered during this same period was 7,391,395 tons, while the shipping that cleared from the British Provinces for the United States from the British Provinces was 10,066,133 tons, and the foreign shipping which entered was 7,430,000 tons. The navigation of the St. Lawrence need not therefore be considered as element of consideration. Next, the treaty was to be considered in its relation to the revenue between the two countries. This had increased immensely, but only proportionately to the vast increase of trade, and due to the increase of population, and the increased facilities of reinterchange. Finally, the Senator thought that between the two countries had been a reciprocity treaty of the most extraordinary character for the benefit of government. In the three years immediately preceding the treaty the total amount of Canadian imports from foreign countries were $48,916,818, and the total imports were $76,588,577, while the total imports in the year preceding the treaty reached to forty-six. In the ten years of the treaty the total imports of Canada from foreign countries were $706,386,951. The total imports were $700,399,760. Accession of our hundred to seventy-eight. If we take Canada as the standard, we have the following gratifying results: First. The total exports to Canada in the three years immediately preceding the treaty were $31,000,000. In the total imports were $6,581,674, being in the proportion of the hundred to fifty-two. Second. The total exports to Canada alone during the ten years of the treaty were $176,071,014, and the total imports were $106,000,000, being in the proportion of one hundred to ninety-four. The last figure of the treaty was in the proportion of one hundred to the revenues of the country. If no treaty had been made the imports would have been in the proportion as before the treaty, Canada would have paid to the United States in duties $16,000,000 instead of $16,581,674, from which she has been relieved. This sum had actually been lost to the United States. The exports would have risen up $7,500,000, being the amount it would have collected if no treaty existed. This would have been in the proportion to the detriment of the United States. During the past year, although the United States had furnished gold in duties to Canada $16,581,962, while during the same period Canada had furnished to the United States the very moderate sum of $930,447. Here again was a vast disproportion to the detriment of the United States. The same inequality might be seen in another way. During the ten years of the treaty the exports of the United States had entered Canada and the free provisions of the treaty had entered the United States during the same period dutiable products of Canada and the free products of the United States had entered Canada to the amount of $7,700,462. During the same period free products of Canada had entered the United States to the amount of $176,071,014. From these various considerations it was clear to him that the treaty was a benefit to Canada, and suffered by this treaty, and that in this important particular it was disadvantageous to the United States and to their countries.

In the House, a bill was passed providing that in any action by or against any executors, administrators, or guardians, in which judgment may be rendered for or against them, neither party shall be allowed to testify, or against the estate of any deceased person, except to testify by the opposite party or by the court. The House resumed the consideration of the proposed amendment to the Constitution.

January 12:

In the Senate, a communication was received from the President in regard to the arrangement limiting the naval armaments on the lakes, and stating that the ratification of force was first sought by this Government. The arrangement was made between Richard Rush, then Secretary of State, and Charles Bagot, British Envoy Extraordinary. A report from the Finance Committee, declined that there was no law requiring the President to issue duty-paid permits to bonded wine-stores. After the consideration of the repeal of the Reciprocity Treaty was resumed, Mr. Sumner said that the object of the treaty was to allow the members to pay their respects to Victoria's new Minister, Lord Lyons. He hoped that the debate was renewed, and the resolution finally passed 31 to 5. As after consideration, the resolution to repeal the treaty sends the President's signature to become final.

In the House, the debate was continued on the Constitutional Amendment.

January 13:

In the Senate, the Consular Appropriation bill was passed. Mr. Hale introduced a bill giving the use of the port at Halifax $3000 instead of $2000 salary was lost. Ocean was also to have notice of the termination of the treaty in regard to the Monroe doctrine, by passing an amendment introduced by Mr. Hale, declaring that "it is impolitic." Said Mr. Wade, we can only recognize the Republic; we have nothing to do with the Empire.

In the House, the debate on the Constitutional Amendment was continued. The consideration of the subject will not again come up until January 30.

January 14:

In the Senate, a resolution offered by Mr. Sumner was passed calling the President communicate to the Senate any information in his possession relative to the violation by Great Britain of the Tenth Article of the Treaty of August 9, 1842 (the Ashburton treaty), and the correspondence relative thereto. Mr. Sumner offered the notice required for the termination of such a treaty.

In the House, the Senate amendments to the joint resolution for the repeal of the Reciprocity Treaty were concurred in. Some peace resolutions offered by Mr. COX were laid on the table by a vote of 84 to 51.

January 17:

In the Senate, no important measure was acted upon.

In the House, the subject of providing a permanent Government for States overthrown or subverted by rebellion came up, and was postponed for two weeks.

MORE ABOUT GRIERSON'S RAID.

General Grierson left Memphis with about 3000 men December 31. Last week we gave an account of his progress to Vicksburg, and thence to Baton Rouge. From Baton Rouge to Opelousas, a distance of 70 miles. He had thus far entirely destroyed the railroad. He made further search at Alexandria for a sharp fight with a rebel force and captured 500 prisoners. From Alexandria to Meridian he had the line of the railroad at Egypt, being compelled to do so by the concentration of rebels against him, and moved westward, striking the Mississippi Central Railroad below Canadada, destroying the railroad for 40 miles, several locomotives and 50 cars, together with extensive rebel factories.

The command consisted of three regiments, commanded by Karge, Winslow, and Osband. About 700 prisoners were captured, among whom was Brigadier-General Gholston, and there were brought in 1000 horses and mules besides 1000 horses. Forty miles of the Mobile and Ohio Railroad were badly damaged that Hood's army can not repair it for months. Nev postmen, new wagons, and a large amount of supplies are also said to have been destroyed in the raid. The destruction at Navada included 300 wagons and 500 cavalry horses and harness. Grierson's loss was about 100 killed and wounded.

HOOD AND THOMAS.

A dispatch from Nashville, dated Macon, January 7, reads as follows:

"General Hood reports from Spring Hill, December 27, 1864, that on the morning of the 16th instant, in front of Columbia, he had 70,000 men, with Beake of his army. They were repulsed on the night with heavy loss, but received reading from Duck River. His infantry engages on the left flank.

"Early on the 16th the enemy made a general attack on his entire line. All their assaults were handsomely repulsed with heavy loss. By 2 P.M. the enemy, with a portion of our line to the left of the centre suddenly gave way, causing our line to break. The rout of the enemy was complete, losing rapidly. Fifty pieces of artillery and several ordnance wagons were left in our hands. Our loss in killed and wounded heretofore small; in prisoners not ascertained. Major-General Cheatham and Brigadier-General Generals T. B. Smith and H. R. Jackson are captured."

The date of the above dispatch is evidently wrong, for instead of December 27, but was probably changed by mistake in the telegraph. The battle of Nashville was somewhat falsehood. Hood says we were repulsed on his right. This is not possible, because it must be admitted that Hood's right did hold its own ground during the day. We stands here, and the enemy's cavalry on our left drove in the infantry supports on his left toward night. What he means by "rout and disorganize" in this case will be hard to define. The truth is, his whole left was by Lynch pressed back, and his centre was forced to retreat. Thus he says that on the 16th all our assaults were repulsed until 2 P.M., when our line to the left gave way. Perhaps so. All we know is, that at 5.30 P.M. the fighting was almost over, and that by 6 P.M. the rebel army had already been accomplished. Hood very incidentally states that during the fight he had taken several ordnance wagons. This is probably while we were losing the battle.

From a dispatch of General Thomas's, dated December 28, we have the following estimate of Hood's losses since he entered Tennessee:

1. At the Battle of Franklin: 6000 killed, wounded, and captured; 4 general officers killed, 6 wounded, and 1 captured.

2. At Murfreesborough on the 5th: 1207 killed, wounded, and captured; 1 general killed; 2 guns.

3. In the battles between the 15th and 16th: 4462 captured; 51 guns; 3000 stands of small-arms; 5 stands of colors; 1 general captured.

4. During the retreat: 1500 to 3000 captured; 15 guns.

5. Cavalry: 1000 killed and captured; 12 guns; 1000 put out of combat; 10 guns.

The above estimate does not include the killed and wounded at the battle of Nashville, because the number of them has not been ascertained. The number of casualties, it has been equal to our own, it must have been over 7000. Four or five thousand is a fair guess for the wounded who are not included in Thomas's estimate.

RELIEF FOR SAVANNAH.

A meeting was held in the New York Produce Exchange on the 11th inst., to take action in reference to the relief of the suffering citizens of Savannah. Colonel Fallon Allen, an agent authorized by Mayor Arnold, addressed the meeting. He said that the people of the capitals, as a general thing, were loyal; but if only a few of them were loyal to the core, it was better that the loyalty rebels should be fed than that one loyal man should starve. He had come to New York to procure provisions for the State of Georgia.

Resolutions were then unanimously adopted, recommending the appointment of a committee of seventeen, to receive the offerings of the people.

Contributions for the suffering people of Savannah were to be received, and sent free in a Government steamer, leaving on the 14th or 15th inst.

FIGHT WITH INDIANS IN COLORADO.

January 7 a fight occurred between the Arapahoe and Cheyenne Indians and the Overland Mail Coach near Julesburg, Colorado, robbing the express box of $60,000 in greenbacks, and killing the driver and one man. The troops at Julesburg started at once in pursuit, and a fight occurred on the 26 Indians and 19 whites were killed. The Indians retreated southward.

EMANCIPATION IN MISSOURI.

The State Convention of Missouri, at St. Louis, on the 11th instant, passed an ordinance for the speedy emancipation by a vote of 60 to 4.

It is the work by the people of the State of Missouri, in Convention assembled, that hereafter in this State there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except in punishment of crime whereof the party shall have been guilty, and that all persons held to service or labor as slaves are hereby declared free."

NEW NOMINATIONS.

Of the list of military nominations recently sent into the Senate by the President the Military Committee of the Senate have reported favorably on all except those of information the following in the regular army: Major-General W. T. Sherman, to date from August 31, 1864; Major-General G. G. Meade, to date from August 18, 1864; Major-General Winfield S. Hancock, to date from April 6, 1864; Major-General G. H. Thomas, to date from December 15, 1864; Major-General Hancock, to date from August 12, 1864; Colonel Benjamin S. Fisher, to be Chief of Signal Corps, to date from December 3, 1864.

NEWS ITEMS.

The rebel General Lyon, who has been trying a raid into Kentucky, is reported to be in Logan County, Kentucky, at his retreat, capturing a company of Federal cavalry. He crossed the Cumberland River below Tallahoma, broke up a few rails, and moved on his way to join Forrest at Decatur.

The rebels have placed a large working force on the East Tennessee railroad, with orders to repair the damage suffered from Stoneman's raid.

Jefferson Davis, in his late message, said that out of 11,796 bales of cotton shipped since last July from the region under the rebel control, "however that may be, it is known that during that time 7834 bales fell into the hands of the enemy."

Major-General Orl Ses succeeded General Butler in the command of the Department of Virginia.

The rebels made another attack on our picket line in front of Petersburg on the morning of the 14th, about daylight, and captured a few videttes on the right of the Second Division of the Ninth Corps.

The loyal men of Philadelphia have subscribed and raised a fund with which to purchase a house for the wife of Lieutenant-General Grant, at a cost of $65,000.

A detachment of Early's rebel army, under General Rosser, made an attack on Beverly, West Virginia, on the 11th inst., and, after an obstinate resistance on the part of the small national force stationed there, captured it and made prisoners of a considerable portion of the garrison, and even after moved off.

Deserters from Lee's army report that some of his troops have lately been sent from Richmond to oppose Sherman in South Carolina.

The rebel spy James Biver has recently been arrested, high, in many places overlooking the banks, and it upon the Potomac, and passed away a considerable portion the bulkhead of the Dutch Gap Canal, which was destroyed by the Christmas Day blast. It is said that a steam ten feet wide and several feet deep was also destroyed.

The manner in which the rebel guerrilla Mosby was driven from Fairfax County is thus described: Mosby had been skirmishing during the 31st with the enemy, and at night went into camp some eight or nine miles distant. The enemy, who were supposed to have retired, returned unperceived, and in the morning, before Colonel Mosby, hearing their footsteps, passed out of the room in which he was, and found himself confronting a squad that had entered the house. At the same moment he was fired upon by some others, and received a wound in the hip. He fell entered just under the ends of the ribs, on the left side, and passed out at a corresponding point on the right side, without wounding the bowels. He walked into a house near by, and was there captured by the Federals that he was an officer in the Sixth Cavalry.

A rebel steamer, loaded with cotton, left Florence, South Carolina, says that in the stockade at that place there were still 10,000 men, 1000 having died from scurvy.

The rebels in Richmond are in a terrible state of panic. Church Hill is deserted, the terrified inhabitants having left their homes in consequence of the recent shelling.

The Richmond Examiner and the Richmond Sentinel, speaking of Hardy and Pendleton Counties, in Virginia, say that they have been overrun by raiders, and that they belong to the Confederacy, and the mountains are infested with a band of deserters and robbers, who have been committing their depredations upon the South Branch of the Potomac.

Mrs. Abraham Lincoln, the Sixth House, at Louisville, was entirely destroyed by fire. The property is estimated at from a million dollars. One person, William Hanna, of Shelby County, was burned to death in the flames. Mrs. Lincoln House was, after the Lindell Hotel, at St. Louis, the largest hotel in the West. It was built by Messrs. Hon. Reverdy Johnson, in a letter to a prominent secessionist, says that the Confederacy, as a belligerent power, is dead.

General Meigs, dated Savannah, says: "You may see me name in any of the papers as one of the commanders of the army, to the effect that every part of the Southern country will soon be under the arms by a victorious system of foraging. More animals are here by your department while standing idle than would have been required to march by land, and seemingly hard marches into the interior."

Mr. Henry S. Foote, late of Mississippi, in a recent visit he delivered a speech in the rebel Congress, bitterly denouncing the policy of the rebel leaders, and recommending, and then resigned his seat, was captured a few days since in Secession, and is now a prisoner in Fort Lafayette. Virginia, by rebel cavalry who had been sent in pursuit of him. At the time he was captured he was attempting to get to Mexico. to make his escape from Rebeldom, and he, in fact, got within 100 miles of the Rio Grande, when, owing to unavoidable delay on his part, Jeff's emissaries were enabled to overtake him and capture him. He is now confined in the Washington.

Major-General John A. Logan reached Savannah January 6, and resumed command of the Fifteenth Army Corps, which, during the month, Brigadier-General was commanded by General Osterhaus.

A. Halifax, N. S., dispatch states that the late rebel pirate Tallahassee, now changed to a blockade-runner, and called the Olustee, was captured by the Niagara.

The rebels have been very busy preparing the railroads of Richmond for the relaying of the tracks, but as yet none have been put down, probably because they do not possess them.

On the 7th instant the steamship Melville, two days out from New York, on her way to Hilton Head Savannah and became a complete wreck. There were eighty-one persons on board, of whom only thirty-two were left on the wreck. The passengers were nearly all residents of Port Royal.

The brevets of Major and Brigadier-General are given to Colonel Curtis, with a few of the companies of the First New Mexico Cavalry, lately raised, and to Colonels Pennybacker, Hawley and Canambres, on Red River, south of the road from Alexandria to Natchitoches, and was finally captured. General Godfrey Weitzel was, on the 18th inst., united in marriage to Miss Louise Bogan, of Cincinnati, Ohio.

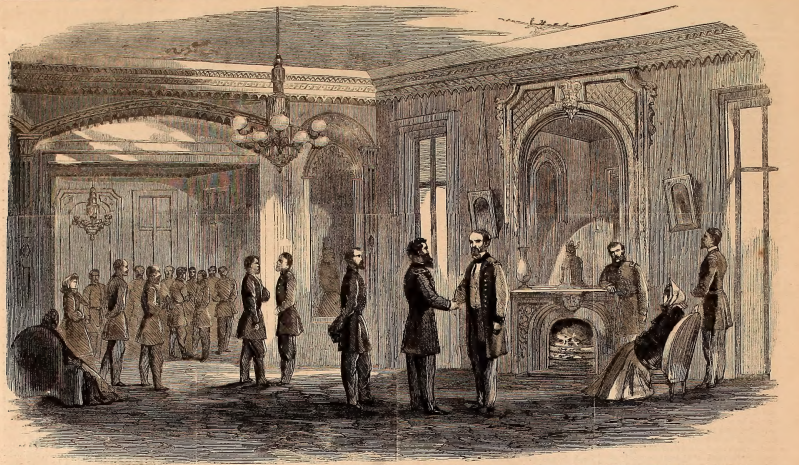
FOREIGN NEWS.

MADRIDIAN issued a manifesto, December 27, recognizing the Roman Catholic religion to be that of Spain, and recommending the abrogation of all ecclesiastical laws passed since 1834. The Belgian Legion had received at VERA Cruz to the number of five thousand. Two thousand more were expected in the month of January.

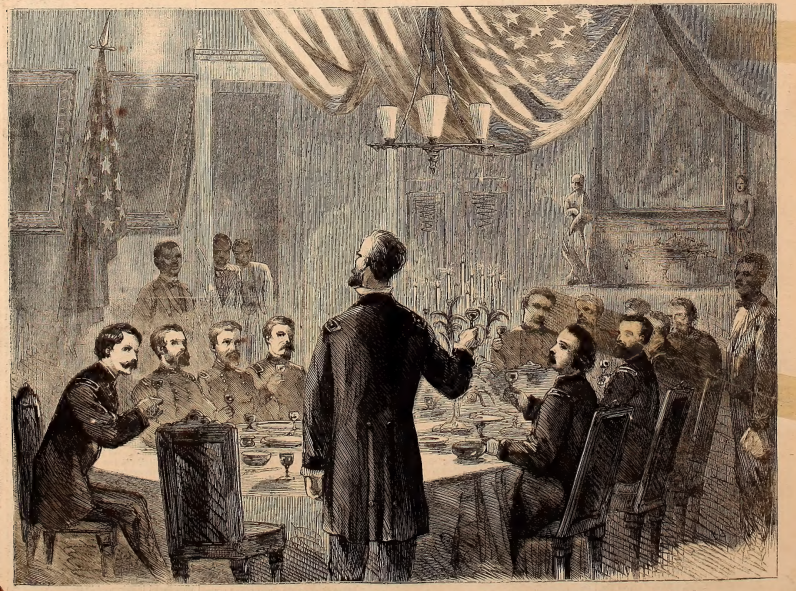


The news of Sherman's capture of Millidgeville, and of Hardee's flight to Augusta, has created a panic in the rebel England, and produced a great sensation. The news from Sherman's army has relieved all former impressions. The London Times says: "The resistance of the Georgians and the invasion of Sherman's army will create great excitation of the war. If Savannah be not yet taken, it will be besieged, and the operations before it will probably give rise to the most important military incidents of the winter."

Hood's defeat had been only partially reported. All that was known when the last of the Confederates had retreated, and driven, with a loss of from 5000 to 6000 prisoners, and 50 guns, from the field.

Great stress is laid in the English Journals on General Hood's order, which was considered unauthorized. On the other hand, great satisfaction was expressed with that part of the President's message bearing on our relations with Canada.

TWEEN DECKS AFTER ACTION—NEWS FROM HOME.



NEW-YEAR'S DAY IN SAVANNAH—GENERAL SHERMAN'S RECEPTION AT MR. GREEN'S.—[SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

THE HOLIDAYS AT SAVANNAH.

IT was fitting that General SHERMAN, whose Christmas gift to the nation added a new zest to the Christmas dinner in every loyal household, should himself have enjoyed the festivity of the season so splendidly and so "fairly won." In the sketch which we have engraved our artist has chosen the moment when the General rose to respond to the toast in his honor, joyously pledged by men whom their illustrious chief had led through many toils and dangers to victory. The response was like the man—unaffected, intense in devotion to the nationality whose glorious symbol proudly hung above him, and full of terror to the enemies of the country as it was of kindness to all its friends. The occasion was a memorable one. But SHERMAN'S deeds and those of his army speak to the country louder than words. On New-Year's Day the General received his friends all day. Mr. GREEN'S splendid parlors were crowded with the throng of visitors.

The effect of SHERMAN'S judicious policy in Savannah is beginning to tell in other portions of the State. The Augusta Chronicle and Sentinel of January 4 notices several facts which must tend to affect all Georgians favorably. It says that the most perfect order is maintained in Savannah, notices several instances in which soldiers have been summarily punished for interference with citizens, and states that soldiers are under no circumstances allowed to enter private residences. The Chronicle goes on to give some items of news in regard to the rehabilitation of Savannah. One or two of the insurance companies of this city are considering a project for establishing a National Bank for the issue of greenbacks. The Custom-house and Post-office are being cleaned out preparatory to a recommencement of business. One store with goods from the North has already been opened. The churches on Sunday are well filled with ladies. A majority of the male population have remained in the city, and those who left have left their families behind them. There is at present no great want of provisions; but there is a scarcity of wood, which General SHERMAN proposes to relieve by getting wood by way of the Gulf Railway and hauling it to the citizens. Eleven hundred loaves of good baker's bread had been turned over by him to the Poor Association and distributed, which the Chronicle considers a kindly kind and providential gift."

The Georgia papers, too, now very strenuously deny that SHERMAN's army, in its march through the State, was guilty of any of the outrages which had been charged upon it. «This denial is based upon the statements of highly respectable citizens who were acquainted with the circumstances.

From the Savannah Republican we learn that, since the occupation of Savannah, elections have been held in Berrien, Thomas, Brooks, Lowndes, Clinch, Montgomery, Appling, and Tattnall Counties, comprising a good portion of Southeastern Georgia, and the following majorities have been given in favor of the restoration of the United States Government. The people have been arming to resist Secessionists, and the most intense excitement prevails in this region. The population of the counties above-named, according to the census of 1860, was upward of 20,000.

The Special Correspondent of the Tribune, writing from Hilton Head, under date of December 30, makes some very important statements, the truth of which can not be doubted without a direct impeachment of the correspondent's veracity:

He states that on the 17th of December THOMAS B. MURRAY, of Milledgeville, Georgia, left that place November 19, and Augusta three days later, arriving at Montreal December 17. He is the proprietor of a large plantation near Milledgeville, is "a man above all DAVIS's own heart, and keeps upon Governor BROWN, and the Georgians in general, maledictions which would do credit to a fiend." He represents the people of his State as greatly disaffected with the DAVIS Government, and ready to accept the most humiliating terms of peace; and the sin of all is in charge upon "that set—if-baby-faced cripple (STEPHENS) and his cabbage-head satellite" (BROWN). He estimates that more than half the Georgians in the army are traitors, but thinks they are surrounded by patriotic officers and soldiers, who will continue to do their duty. Mr. MURRAY states that the most valuable government property and machinery was removed from Augusta, on SHERMAN's approach, to Branchville and Kingsville, S. C., but will probably be returned, as the Augusta Canal affords a water-power equaled nowhere else in the Confederacy. He states that, during the past year and a half, Augusta has produced more munitions and engineery of war than any three towns in the Confederacy combined, and that the number of negroes that joined SHERMAN's army was immense, he himself losing forty.

But the most important of Mr. MURRAY's statements is in regard to two petitions, one signed by 12,000 citizens of the State, to be offered in the Rebel Senate, and the other, signed by 15,000 women, to be presented to JEFF DAVIS. The former Senator HILL was requested to offer in the Senate, but declined to do so. Each petition set forth the hopelessness of the rebellion, and prayed for peace.

The Tribune correspondent saw a refugee copy of the women's petition. It began: "The undersigned mothers, sisters, wives, and widows of officers and soldiers of the Commonwealth of Georgia, who are living or have died in the military service of their country, respectfully submit to your Excellency and pray, etc. It then recounts the manifold sacrifices they have, without murmuring, made; the privations they have patiently endured, and the encouragement they have heroically given their loved ones in the field, etc. Next, it depicts the horrors of war, and attempts to show that all efforts on the part of the Confederacy to achieve its independence must in the end prove futile. It then fervently appeals to his Excellency, in the name of reason, humanity, and Christianity, to terminate the murderous contest; and assures him that, if that result can only be attained by sacrificing his personal pride and ambition, he may, by making the sacrifice while he has yet powerful armies at his command, obtain a place in history as the greatest patriot of modern times."

MR. DAVIS denied that he had been actuated by a desire for power or personal aggrandizement, and that as soon as it was shown that the peace and welfare of his country would be promoted by his retirement from office he would follow the example of NAPOLEON I. Whereupon the craven people's wife demanded the sacrifice at his hands to repent of their ingratitude and folly." He begged of them women to continue their efforts for one year longer, assuring them that if by that time peace did not smile upon the country, or its independence be recognized by foreign powers, he would no longer be President."

There is much in this report in regard to DAVIS's statements that is hard to believe; but, according to this correspondent, MURRAY said that his statement was confirmed by an interview which he had a short time before with DAVIS at Richmond. MURRAY stated, moreover, that DAVIS, when he said that, in the contingency named, he would no longer be President, meant that he would be King.

But the fact of the petitions, signed by about 27,000 people of Georgia, is that to which we draw attention. If it is a fact, then we may easily infer what the result will be if Governor BROWN follows the suggestion urged by the citizens of Savannah in their meeting of December 28, and allows the citizens of Georgia to vote on the question of the continuance of the war.

TWO.

Two buds plucked from the tree;
Two birdies flown from the nest;
Two little babies snatched
From a fond mother's breast;
Two little snow-white lambs
Gone from the sheltering fold;
Two little narrow graves
Down in the north-yard cold.

Two little drooping flowers,
Growing in a purer air,
Blooming fragrant and bright
In the great Gardener's care;
Two little forms of light
Flown far from fear and harm;
Two little snow-white lambs
In the good Shepherd's arm.

Two little angels more,
Singing with sweet voices,
Flinging their crowns of gold
Down at their Saviour's feet.
Free from all earthly stain—
Oh, who could wish them back
In this drear world again?

HANNAH GNELDT'S GOOD-STEP.

HANNAH GNELDT leaned upon her broom, and looked out from the low kitchen door across the silvery fields and the ice-glazed streamlet which lay between her home and the little village of Greenock, with its one church-spire and its shaggy roofs and blank white walls, bare now of the summer verdure. She had done her household work, polished every article capable of polish, and swept and sanded all the rest. At the last she had swept clean her doorstone, and now felt free to do what she chose, to rest, or gossip, or to do more work—a thing impossible to her while a spot beneath her roof was out of order. Just now she felt neither like gossiping nor sewing; her heart was very full, and she found it necessary to stand still and think a while. Only that she was not sad. In the world here cried, she was very sad. It seemed to her that the happiest people were those who lay in their green graves, in the church-yard, with crossed hands upon their bosoms, and feet quiet from all earthly going to and fro for evermore.

Not that HANNAH GNELDT was tired in body, or weary with the toil of household duty; for she was strong of frame, and her health was perfect, as her hands were willing. But in her heart she bore heavily the burden lay, her spirit that was worn with earthly travail.

"Twenty-three years to-day I've been his wife," she muttered, "and I've loved him well, and worked hard and faithful to keep things decent, and it's come to this at last! I've been better, says he, 'if he'd married Miss Lester!'"

Yes, that was what Farmer Gneldt, harassed by frail and debt, had said to his wife very recently; and it seemed to Hannah like the confession of a long repentance, forced from her husband's lips at last.

"Poor man! I wish I could help him," she sighed, leaning on her broom beside the door. "I do, but he's right about Miss Lester."

With that her eyes fell and rested by chance on the door-step.

"I can send that, any how," she said; "and I have time, for work is done."

So she hung the broom up, and peeped into her oven, and set the kettle on, and then, hooded and shawled, crossed the fields to where the farm joined that of Simeon Gray.

On one path were men at work, and stones lying about.

Hannah Gneldt nodded to the old farmer, and he came to meet her.

"I want a stone," she said. "May I have one?"

"I 've said I'd take 'em for the new farmer," a lot o' rubbish. You see I'm clearing away what they call the old grave-yard at last. Wife talks to me o' sanitary regulations, and such. Bless you, there ain't been none for years and years; and these hard times a man can't let land go to waste. I tell wife she don't know nothin' about it. What d'ye want to do? Pave a bit around the well?"

"No, I want a step," said Hannah. "That great white one just the thing." She had pointed to a slab hard by.

"It 's shall bring it over to-night," said the farmer.

"No," said Hannah. "I can roll it myself."

And her arms, strong as most men's, went to work at once, and the slab was rolled, and pushed, and pulled, and lifted. It was half a labour, but it did Hannah good. She tugged away, pushing and lifting, and adding woman's ingenuity to man's strength, and got it at last to where it was to be.

There she let it rest, and dug the old stone out, and afterward brought water to wash the white with, and then, as the snow, for the most part, with some little yellow weather-stains about the edge, and on one side a black inscription and frame, a line of eulogy, and dates. Hannah stared with the curiosity of one who can not read.

"I wish I could tell what that was," she said. "Some one's name and age. Ah, there were sore hearts when that was new. I hope when I die there will be some written over me who be a good wife. I've tried to be. I ought to know that big letter—wait a bit, I believe it is Z."

Then she turned the inscription downward, and washed the other side, clear and white, and fitted it into its place.

She received little credit for her work. Oliver only muttered,

"You needn't have published the fact that I couldn't afford a porch to all the place." And no one noticed the step afterward save Hannah when she scrubbed it.

Matters were very bad at the Gneldts'. Oliver brooded over the fire in speechless sorrow, and grew grayer and balder with each passing day. Hannah kept ruin off a little by making a home of the poor house, and a feast of the humble fare, by her housewife's skill. She might even have been cheerful but for the memory of that luckless speech.

Working in her garden one day, when the first spring grass was growing green, Hannah heard footsteps, and lifting her head, saw two gentlemen beside her, and arose precipitately with womanly anxiety about her ankles, not strictly covered perhaps by her petticoats. The nearest gentleman, an elderly man with bright dark eyes, addressed her,

"Mrs. Gneldt, I presume."

"Yes, Sir."

She asked him to walk in, and he did so, the other following.

In the little parlor they sat down.

"You are Mrs. Hannah Gneldt, Oliver Gneldt's wife?"

"Yes, Sir. Is it about—about—excuse me, you look like a lawyer, and I fear it's more trouble for Oliver."

"Reassure yourself," said the gentleman. "Reassure yourself, madame. Your husband is not concerned, and nothing you, not even I hope pleasantly. Your name was Burns before you were married?"

"Yes, Sir. Hannah Burns."

"Do you remember dates well?"

"No, Sir."

"You have, perhaps, records of family events—your own birth, your parent's marriage, your grandfather's death?"

Hannah Gneldt wond-ringly replied, "I have mother's Bible, and they tell me it's all there."

"How far back?"

"To grandfather's birth, I believe—grandfather Burns. He had one child, and I am the only one my parents ever had. They are set down our wedding-day, and our two boys' birthdays."

"And your great-grandfather. The record of his death is there?"

"I don't know; you may see. Wait, I'll call Oliver."

Going to the door Hannah took down a horn, used for that purpose, and uttered a call, which brought Oliver Gneldt home from the field at once.

He, too, had the same unfortunate quieted him. Almost as much astonished as his wife he brought out the old Bible.

"The death of my wife's great-grandfather, Zebulon Burns, is not here," he said. "The first record is in his hand, I believe. It is the birth of his eldest child."

So it proved, and the lawyer looked disappointed.

"You can not remember the day of his death?"

he said, in a tone that was less of it."

"He died long before I was born," said Hannah, and, though rich, left nothing to grandfather. They had quarrelled, I believe. She told odd stories of him. He must have been very eccentric, and a servant or housekeeper had great influence over him. She hated Hannah. She told stories of Margery—"

"Margery Wilber, I think," said the lawyer, "yes," said Hannah, "I remember now."

"You are quiet people, not likely to talk too much," said the lawyer, "but tell you something. We have found a will among the effects of a legal gentleman who died very suddenly in a fit of apoplexy, which makes you, Hannah Gneldt, heir in your favor—that is, now in your favor, as your father's only child."

Hannah clasped her husband's hand.

"It is written by one upon his death-bed, dated the 10th of March, 17—, and leaves all his property to Margery Wilber, Jonathon, then a boy. Hush! don't hope too much. Margery Wilber or her heirs now hold this property under a will dated March 10, 17—."

"A later will," said Oliver. "Then, of course, they are the rightful possessors. What need of all this?—the later will must prevail."

"Not if it is a forgery," said the lawyer.

Oliver laughed, the bitter laugh of care and disappointment.

"Who can prove that?" he said.

"No one, perhaps. Yet the record of the old man's death may."

"A man whose dying hand signed a will on the 10th of March would scarcely make another on the 15th. We believe the will a forgery, written on old parchment, since the discovery of the one in question. Margery Wilber took possession with no legal forms, for no one appeared to contest her title. Where was your great-grandfather buried?"

"Here," said Hannah. "They say he was brought down at his request—MRS. WILBER as chief mourner, and Margery Wilber—not even sent for. An old grave-yard somewhere. Oh, Oliver! Oliver!"

She turned quite white, and uttered a cry. "Oliver, that must be the grave-yard on Gray's place that he dug over last winter in the warm spell."

"Then it is gone," said Oliver. "And our last hope with it. No, gentlemen, good luck could never come to us. Poverty means to cling to us to the end. I wish I were dead."

"Oliver, Oliver!" gasped Hannah Gneldt, "tell me one thing. Zebulon was great-grandfather's name. Zebulon is spelled with a Z, isn't it? Oh, do speak!"

"I think you are going mad, Hannah; of course it is."

"Oh, the big Z, I remember it so well! I knew it was Z; and it would have been broken to pieces before now. Oliver, you remember my description that you were so angry at? I believe it's my poor old great-grandfather's tombstone. And I not to know it, when I stared at the great Z!"

Oliver Gneldt said nothing. He feared his wife's brain was turned, and that made him faint and cold as he followed her into the garden, and there watched while the three others lifted the flat slab.

It lay before them on the green spring grass, black letters on its whiteness, and, bending over it, they read aloud:

"Zebulon Burns. Born May —. Died March 15, 17—," with eulogistic verses, with long s's unknown, as in duty bound.

"It's poor great-grandfather!" said Hannah. And the lawyer extended his hands, grasping those of Oliver and his wife.

"The proof is found!" he said. "The latest will is a forgery, for it is dated the day after the old man's death. MRS. GNELDT is heiress to a large property. I congratulate you."

And Hannah, with her head upon her husband's shoulder, whispered, "Oliver, it wouldn't have been better to have married Miss Lester after all?"

A LITTLE BOX FOR YOU, SIR."

KATE CORTLOWS was the bishop's only child—beautiful, accomplished, clever, and an heiress. Therefore it was quite a natural conclusion that we (I speak advisedly)—we, I say, were all in love with her; from the venerable prelate, who innocently told us he liked her best because she was something like his mother, to the brazen-faced old reprobate, our lieutenant-colonel, who actually grew virtuous for the six months we remained in the pleasant old city, and not only got inside the cathedral in time for service, but kept awake until the sermon began, when he took his revenge by snoring behind his red curtain, publicly reprimanding a newly-joined sub for the same delinquency, adding, that if he did sleep he ought to do so in a different way.

I believe most regiments have at least one lady-killer on their list—one, I mean par excellence the acknowledged Adonis. Our regiment, the Caption Hetherston, who rejoiced in the nickname of Box, owing to the efficient manner in which he came out in the regimental knows during the full-dress old comedy. Although a popular man with the mess, he was not individually a favorite. That was not at all my particular way of looking at it. But it was not jealousy; his good looks had nothing to do with the feeling. It was the "take all and give nothing" sort of way he had that did the mischief. None of us could have said we knew where he came from, or where the friends he talked so big about lived, or how much de'ar he had to spare, or where it came from. We saw him as he was—an uncommonly handsome, well-dressed, and well-bred fellow. That was all we saw, too, for we spent a dollar he could screw out of another man, and sponged cleverly upon any of us for a meal or a canvas, by a kind of instinct. I am afraid I think that he had always an excuse ready to meet any chance demand for liberality; and when he suddenly ruled some of us most was that, upon the strength of a pretty little house in B——, he kept clear of the little expensive dissipations which form our paths, and kept his divinity so quiet that a whisper stole among us to the effect that the lady in B—— was delusion.

He had affected indifference toward the heiress at first, and then had quietly concentrated his forces and taken up his position in a manner which would have done him infinite credit in the field of war as well as love. At first he made but little ground; but the enemy was busy, having with it reviews, chance rides, and sketching parties.

The heiress looked amiable. The captain grew sentimental, and thought of giving up smoking the house in town. Our fellows began to prick up their ears, and the odds in his favor were freely offered. The match, from being the talk of the town, of course crept out and got into the gossips' mouths in the town, and soon conjecture and scandal were at their height.

Meantime Box ate as many dinners as the bishop offered him, called regularly, paid court to the maiden aunt who superintended the housekeeping department, and took all the credit he could get.

Things were at this pass when a detachment from the —th Regiment exchanged into our corps—not a prepossessing youth at first sight, very young and boyish-looking, with a limbered with a quiet, unpossible sort of temper, that seemed proof against all the sarcasms, innuendoes, and even insults, freely lavished under the cover of politeness.

He seemed to have got his first step very quickly, and though with all the makings of a fine soldier-like man, he was just at that stage of his overgrown, loose-limbed boy; with a propensity to blush when a woman spoke to him, and a quiet manner of getting out of the way if ever he found himself together strictly decorous was going on or being canvassed. He was laughed at, of course, and many a trap laid for admiring him to his ruin; but all failed. The laughwade no impression; he went on, quietly and consistently keeping his own counsel with a good-natured but perfectly firm indifference, and ere long, somehow, most of us began to have a respect for the young lad, and just ceased to notice left. We had a little felt ashamed of the scenes he avoided.

Box seemed to have taken an antipathy to the new-comer, and, just previous to the ball in consequence was a constant sparring and repetition of jokes perpetrated by the captain, who made a heavy siege he would have succeeded in getting to hold Vincent before the year was out. Vincent heard of it somehow, and only laughed in his quiet way, declaring that he would be in the field no longer than Box. Still, through all this affected carelessness, we who watched closest could see how the spirit rebelled, and how the boy's temper boiled under the persecutions of the captain, who divided his time pretty equally between tormenting Vincent and keeping sweet.

The townsfolk were already deciding the settlement; young ladies were speculating who would be asked to the bridesmaids; and not a few ill-natured remarks were being raked up as to dirtiations, and, after the manner of our dear friends, not a little was hinted about the petty peccadilloes of the past.

September, with its turnip-fields and partridges; October, with its red woods, pheasants, and long evenings, worked up the country hospitality to a pitch there was no withstanding. Dinner invitations flowed in like a flood. The master's coffer was well-nigh a sinecure, and his pockets profiting accordingly. The engagement was not yet completed, but what October and the shooting season failed to accomplish the hunting-field gave ample promise of fulfilling. The heiress was a first-rate horsewoman, and never missed a meet if she could find a lady to second her. Accordingly, Box took a trip to town and brought back a couple of nutters. Our fellows first opened their eyes one morn their mouths; but nothing came of it as "that Box said, with one of his shut-you-up laughs. They cost me a cool hundred apiece, but still take three for the lot."

"The deuce you will!" muttered Vincent, as to the subject dropped. The captain looking to his pipe, while kindly shine well and straight when he did ride, but exchanging much following, except after Miss Courtown.

Vincent turned out a hunting man too, and soon showed us that, although we might get our laugh at him in the mess-room or on parade, we had to second fiddle with a vengeance at the covert side. There was no doubt about it, the fellow was a tiptop rider, and soon made himself a marked man in the field, both on account of his tact and judgment, and the quiet, gentleman-like way in which he did the business. The livery-stable keepers became busy him with offers of their best horses; he might have them for half-price—nay, I believe for nothing, if he'd only give them to sell. Vincent had not much of it as he wanted, and when our fellows quizzed him for not buying a couple of beasts for himself, he said with a laugh, "I'm waiting to get Box Courtown's when he's tired of them." Box heard the joke, and didn't like it; he was beginning to get a little afraid of the quiet lieutenant; and, moreover, the heiress had noticed the new rider, and poor Box was as jealous as a modern Othello.

December came in, and Vincent gave no signs of wishing to alter his quarters; nay, he publicly stated he was very jolly, and that he'd not miss the February meet for all the leave in the service. The case was getting serious; so was the courting at the bishop's, Hetherston evidently not having opportunity to take the grand check; the lady, to all appearance, willing to accept the mate.

Yet anxious as the state of the matrimonial speculation may be supposed to render the captain, certain figures in a little Russian leather pocket-book began to become disagreeably prominent. The year was upon its last legs. Charley Vincent was showing no signs of tiring of the jokes perpetrated upon him; indeed, like the sells, his quarters not only to have got used to them, but there seemed a sort of pleasant excitement and uncertainty as to the next arrow which should hit him; and Hetherston began to think he had been a little rash in booking so many figures, which, when reckoned up (in case of the worst), came to a much larger sum than was convenient, to say nothing of being beaten—a humiliation the captain did not relish at any time.

A dinner party was to come off at the bishop's a few evenings before Christmas; all the big-wigs and county people were to be there: a select few of "our" visitors, of course included—Vincent, of course, and we made up our minds—though upon what grounds Heaven only knows—that Box would pop the question that night. The bishop was in that tender dreamy state which betrays the awakened heart, and gives the lover courage to take the irrevocable step. The bishop looked the very picture of a fatherly prelate, and had a mischievous, come-all-about-it sort of twinkle in his eyes, the pairing off his guests for the important ceremony of going down to be fed, he told Hetherston to take "Mr daughter." It was my luck to follow the couple, and it spoiled my dinner, for I had been fool enough to take the odds against the match, and it was pretty even then I should lose.

"Take you a hundred to ten he'll do it to-night," whispered Harry Fulton as we streamed down stairs, the happy couple being directly in front of us, and looking abominably foolish, as is the manner of people at such a crisis.

"Done," said I, involuntarily, and then mentally cursed my folly.

The dinner passed off as such dinners usually do; the soup was thick, fish good, joints full, and the other things horrible, saving the dessert, which, being fresh from dame Nature, can not be easily spoiled. I had been given a ponderous dame to look after, and I noticed that Hetherston had taken the opportunity to take the head of the table, and, whom, to my surprise, I discovered to be a sister of Vincent's, then upon a visit. Of course we had plenty to talk of, and ere the dinner was over I began to think Vincent one of the nicest fellows I had met. I spoke of him most complimentarily, I assure you. The important business of eating was over, and the servants retiring, when a footman entered with the news, carrying in a large white deal box, which he deposited upon the ground behind the captain's chair, saying, in a distinct and emphatic voice—

"A little box for you, sir!"

He then quietly made his exit, though not before I caught a glimpse of his face, which, in spite of powder and fake whiskers, looked uncommonly like Vincent's, and made me hold my breath in anxiety to see the result, convinced that the joke, whatever it was, would be a clencher. Nor was I wrong; and amidst the buzz of inquiry and polite curiosity that the advent of a deal box in the midst of a formal dinner party might be supposed to excite, a long, plaintive and unmistakably infantine cry rose from the mysterious box.

Captain Hetherston started to his feet with an oath, and looked like a maniac. An attempt at decorum held the lookers on silent for an instant, then a perfect storm of laughter broke forth, under cover of which poor Box rushed from the room in a state of mind "better to be imagined than described," as the reporters say.

Truly Vincent had his revenge; there was no use telling the bishop the baby was the color-sergeant's, and the whole thing a practical joke. Hetherston tried it once, but made no further attempt. The story went the round of the county, got up to town, and into the morning paper, and the end was, that our all-accomplished Box, under the plea of sudden business, left for the front; and ere a year had passed over our heads Vincent was figuring off in the papers as having led to the hymeneal altar Kate Courtown, only daughter of the Bishop of——.

THE GRAND DUKE'S NEW SUIT.

ONCE upon a time there was a Grand Duke so fond of new clothes that he spent all his money on his toilet. Whenever he reviewed his troops, whatever he went to the theatre or took a ride, it was always for one purpose—to show off his new clothes. Every hour of the day he changed his costume; and, as it is said of a King—"He in his council chamber," it was said of him—"He is in his dressing-room." The capital was an exceedingly gay city, thanks to the number of foreigners passing through it. But one day there likewise came two rascals who gave themselves out for weavers, and declared they were capable of weaving the most magnificent cloth in the world. Not only were the colors and material of extraordinary beauty, but the garments made from this stuff possessed a marvelous property—they became invisible to every functionary ignorant of the duties of his office, or to any one of limited understanding.

"These must, indeed, be invaluable clothes," thought the Grand Duke; "if I wear them, I think I should be enabled to find out the incapable members of my Government, and readily distinguish the competent from the incompetent. Yes, this wondrous cloth is indispensable to me." He then advanced a large sum of money to the two rogues, that they might immediately begin their work.

Indeed, they set up two looms, and made pretense of busying themselves, though in reality there was absolutely nothing on the looms. They busy weasingly asked for the finest of silk and the purest of gold thread; but they placed all that in their bag, working till late into the night with empty looms.

"I should like to know how the labor is progressing," said the Grand Duke to himself. But he felt an heart-ache on recollecting that whoever was stupid or incapable of fulfilling their functions were unable to see this magic cloth. Not that he for a moment doubted his own capacity, but he judged it best to send some one to make a prior examination. The entire inhabitants of the city were informed of the marvelous qualities of the cloth, and all awaited impatiently the knowledge of their neighbors' stupidity.

"I will send my good old Minister to the weavers," thought the Grand Duke; "none can judge better of the cloth than he, for he is sensible, distinguished as he is by his sense and knowledge of the requirements of the position he fills."

The honest old Minister entered the room in which the two impostors plied their empty looms.

"Egad!" thought he, opening wide his eyes, "I can see nothing." But he took care not to say so.

The two rogues invited him to draw near, and inquired of him how he found the design and colors.

They at the same time pointed to the empty looms, and the old Minister earnestly fixed his gaze upon them; but he saw nothing for the simple reason that there was nothing to see.

"Gracious goodness!" thought he, "am I in reality a blockhead? None must have a suspicion of it, that is certain. Really be silent? I dare not avow that the cloth is invisible to me."

"Well, what think you of it?" said one of the weavers.

"Charming! most charming!" replied the Minister, putting on his spectacles, "the design and those colors . . . Yes, I will tell his Highness that I am extremely satisfied."

"It is fortunate for us," said the two weavers; and they commenced an elaborate explanation of the forms and beauties of this imaginary piece of work. The old Minister listened also with attention that he might repeat to the Grand Duke a true and full description of it.

The rogues were continuous in their demands for money, silk, and gold; an enormous quantity was required for this not-to-be-equaled tissue. Of course they pocketed all; the looms remained empty, and still they worked on.

Some time after the Grand Duke sent another honest functionary to see how the cloth was and see if it advanced to a termination. The same thing happened to this new deputy as had happened to the Minister; he looked and looked, but saw nothing.

"Is not the tissue admirable?" thought the impostors, pointing to the superb design and gorgeous colors that did not exist.

"And yet I am not a simpleton," thought the visitor. "I can be no fool, for filling my office! It is strange; but I will be careful how I lose my position." He praised the cloth, and expressed his admiration at the beauty and magnificence of the colors.

"It is of incomparable magnificence," said he to his master. And nothing was spoken of in the city but this extraordinary cloth.

Finally the weaving himself desired to see it while yet on the loom. Accompanied by a crowd of chosen courtiers, among whom were the two honest functionaries before visited the two rogues, who plied their shuttles continually, though employing neither silk, nor gold, nor any kind of thread.

"Is it not magnificent?" asked the two honest functionaries. "The design and colors are worthy of your Highness." And they pointed to the empty looms, believing the others might perceive something.

"What the deuce!" thought the Grand Duke; "I can see nothing. This is terrible. Am I, then, a blockhead? Am I incapable of governing? No greater misfortune could occur." Then he cried, suddenly: "It is magnificent! And I here publicly announce my entire satisfaction." He waggled his head with a contented air, and looked at the looms, not daring to tell the truth—that is, to say the same, one after the other, but without seeing any thing, and repeated, like him, "It is magnificent!" They even advised him to wear garments of this new cloth at the first grand procession. "It is magnificent! it is charming! It is admirable!" exclaimed every mouth; and the satisfaction was general.

The two impostors were decorated and received the title of Grand Court Weavers.

The whole night preceding the day of the procession they sat up and worked by the light of numerous tapers. Every one exposed on themselves was visible to every one. At last they pretended to take the cloth from off the looms, cut through emptiness with large scissors, stitched with threadless needles, after which they proclaimed the raiment to be finished.

The Grand Duke, followed by his aids-de-camp, went to examine it, and the sharpers, raising their arms as though lifting something, said,

"Here are the trousers, here the doublet, here is the mantle. They are as light as a spider's web. There is no fear of the body being oppressed by their weight; and in this, above all, lies the virtue of the cloth."

"Certainly," replied the aids-de-camp; but they saw nothing, since there was nothing to see.

"If his Grand Ducal Highness will condescend to undress," said the rogues, "we will try on him the garments before the pier-glass."

His Highness undressed, and the rogues made believe to dress him piece-portion of the attire. They placed their hands on his shoulder as though in the act of fastening something; it was the train. The Grand Duke turned and twisted before the glass.

"Jupiter! How well it fits! What an elegant make!" cried all the courtiers. "What a design! What colors! What a magnificent costume!"

The Grand Master of the Ceremonies entered.

"The canopy beneath which your Highness is to take part in the procession awaits you," said he.

"Very well! I am ready," replied the Grand Duke. "It seems to me that I have not a bad appearance!" And he gave one more turn before the glass, and cast another admiring look on the supposed splendor of his raiment.

The chamberlains whose duty it was to bear the train, went through the performance of raising some thing from off the floor, then lifted their hands as to hold this fictitious train, not wishing it to be thought that they saw nothing.

While the monarch proudly headed the procession beneath his magnificent canopy every body in the street and at the windows cried aloud, "What a superb garment! What a graceful train! What a perfect make!" No person would have it known that he saw nothing: had he done so he would have run the risk of passing for a fool, or worse still, for unfit for his grand ducal clothes excited such an amount of admiration.

"But I don't see that he has any clothes on at all," observed a little child.

"Holy Father! only listen to the innocent!" said the parents, and each person whispered among themselves the child's remark.

"There is a little child who says that the Grand Duke has no clothes on at all!"

"He has no clothes on at all!" finally shouted the crowd; and the Grand Duke was extremely vexed, for it seemed that they were right. He, however, was resolved on the course to follow.

"Under any circumstances I must go through with it to the end," thought he.

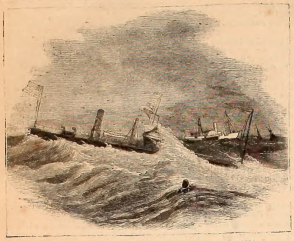
Then he drew himself up more proudly than ever, and the chamberlains continued respectfully to bear the train which did not exist.

INTERESTING ITEMS.

CHILDREN.—The "bonducher" of early childhood are on the increase; medical men are more than ever alive to the fact that children require physic, and must have it, but too often, too early, and far too hard-worked in the schoolroom, they are not. Let the schoolmaster have a care for too early exhibition in the drawing-room. They pass too much of their time in the school-room as a sort of slave by drill-attained manners, utterly destructive of the sweetness and natural independence of true children. If ever, from the earliest moment they can be taught any thing, they are to be taught that "to be a child is to be pretty;" so if, in real truth, the prettiest feature of child life was to be the unconscious exhibition of their childish nature. Martyrs to the vanity of our day, they are to be tempered to it by habits more and more removed from exhibition of their dresses and the ingenuity of their "bonducher" [bonnet]. Taught a deportment . . . . . with their costume, they become, but too often, human dressing-machines, and their natural gait, or the winning artlessness proper to their age being thus forcibly taken from them, they become, most pretty pictures, when they had far better be tumbling about with the abandon natural to them. Let the schoolmaster have a care how he claim to that sort of prettiness their careful "get up" gives to their appearance, remembering in the matter has he fruit in that great amount of butterflyism of which we see so much in the thoughtless, heartless, characterless specimens of young-lady life of which every London drawing-room is full. Teach real gentlemanliness in them some of them; but there is the same sad sense of "not to be seen" about them, which, in real and unadorning, only of an older kind, is that with which at from the nursery they were ordered the drawing-room, to visitors or the dining-room to dessert.

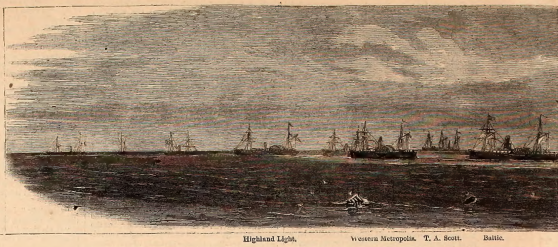
UTILITARIANS or philosophers, because of our metropolis, may congratulate themselves on the facility with which its streets are cleansed. The Liverpool Mercury, on the other hand, and the East River on the other, by their rapid and tidal currents, are kept free from much of their refuse before the city of its works. London depends interruptions on the Thames alone, although large sums for her drainage system continue. As the city is situated upon almost a dead level, the sewers require a great and some distance underground, at great expense, in order to discharge its sewage into the river at low water. South, so as to be effectual, have brought back again by the tide. All the populous towns of England are similarly situated, and debilitating fevers, pestilence, killing their tens, and sadden ing their thousands of pestilence. It is now proposed to meet this serious evil by the application of the sewage, and contractors are competing with each other to see who will do it cheapest. It is thought that in this way a new benefit of wealth will be introduced. A London paper, speaking of the subject, says: "A hundred years hence the people of this city will look back with astonishment upon the present mode of applying filth to the purposes of pestilence, so manifestly as it is, to be daily observation, and so beneficial in result, as to make a difference for them to realize the fact that their sewers of only a century back, to whom they still have to ascribe such wonderful mechanical skill, were the gigantic monuments of engineering skill, could have been so blind as to read what will be the feeling to the last generation with means of Nature as to befoul their rivers with the waste which will have rendered them exhausted wells."

THE SECRET OF MAKING DOLLS' EYES.—How a Birmingham manufacturer learned the secret of making dolls' eyes, and how Birmingham came to be extensively engaged in making those apparently trifling but really important little articles was amusingly explained by Mr. Oxley, of that city, some years ago, before a committee of the House of Commons: "A respectable-looking man in the city," says Mr. Cotter, "asked me if I could supply him with dolls' eyes, and I was foolish enough to feel half offended; I thought it derogatory to my dignity, as a manufacturer, to make dolls' eyes. He took me into a room quite wide, and, perhaps, twice the length of this committee-room, and he had just room to walk between each from the floor to the ceiling, of parts of dolls. He said, 'There are dolls' legs and arms;' the remainder below. I had seen enough to convince me that he wanted me to make a machine which would, at the same moment, make his own line of business. I said I would take an order by way of experiment, and he showed me a pattern eye and copied the order. He ordered various quantities, and of various sizes and colors. On returning home I found that the order amounted to upward of £600. I went into the matter, and endeavored to make them. I had some of the most ingenious glass-by-makers in the Kingdom in my employment. I said, 'Now show me how you shade their heads, and said you had often seen the artists shade the heads to make it resemble nature.' I went to one their best coachmen; but after trying and wasting a great deal of time he said he was sorry he was obliged to relinquish the attempt. Soon afterward I received another branch of business, and took no more notice of it. About eighteen months ago I resumed the thinker thinking, and then determined to think of the doll eyes; and about eight months since I accidentally met with a person who had improved upon the machine of mine, and who was dying in a consumption, in a state of great want. I showed him his sovereign, and he said he would instruct me in the process. He was in such a state of mind that I could see the effects of his misery, for though I was conversant with the manual part of the business, and I was obliged to him for it daily in the forenoon, I felt I could do nothing from his description. I mention this to show how difficult it is to convey a description, the mode of working). He took me into his room, and he put the head completed in a vice, to a degree, that he actually used the entrails and fix of poultry from Leadenhall-market to steer by. In six months, before I had seen him make three, I felt confident I could go home." Mr. Cotter afterward became a large manufacturer of these articles.



A CURIOUS CASE OF DISSENTION.—Some time since John Pendleton, Esq., died at his residence in Loudoun county, Virginia. The woman kept a common-house in that city. Pendleton directed that his body should be taken to Alexandria and transport him to Chicago. A trunk was procured, 25 inches in length, 20 inches in width, and 20 inches deep, which had a very small orifice in it, through which, by means of a funnel, the body was preserved in a solution of alcohol and small modicum of ale. This trunk with its human freight, accompanied by a colored woman, was placed on the afternoon boat. At Fortress Monroe Miss Lissker kicked the trunk, and stirred the contents, when the woman, in a loud and self-important—features which present themselves in all grades of the Saxon physiognomy. The body was that of a gipsy," is a proverb in Scotland, which reminds us of an anecdote of a Scotch gipsy who, being asked whether the Queen at Balmoral, a few years ago. Having been commissioned by a friend to procure a Scotch cap, as the melodious pipes, he applied to her Majesty's piper—a fine specimen of Highland manhood—for information as to the locality in which such articles were required, his lordship said in reply, "Just such another as yourself." The stranger, though not readily outclassed, with more than the wonted humor, "There are plenty of Scotch caps to be procured, but very few such as me."

LOVE LETTER THE CAUSE.—A Savannah paper contains letters from Captain Hatch, the rebel, and Colonel Holcombe, the Confederate commissioner to the British Court in Savannah, from which it appears that if lovers have their troubles others are also found. We even entertain by scenes of war, with them well. The lady had sent some "verses and flowers" to the gallant Hatch, who languished a prisoner at the North. This seemed like unsubstantial food for a brave soldier, but it proved to him a recourse to the comforts of home and the society of his lady love. Colonel Holcombe, who had the "verses and flowers" in charge, forwarded the "verses and flowers" delivered in person to your friend, and not only that, but I had him and his companion to dinner, and I trust that you have ere this had the pleasure of hearing from him that he has. Mr. Octavus was the receiver of your letter containing the flowers."



A CONNECTICUT man has invented a watch which will run a year without winding. It will also keep time.

AUSTRALIAN CHILDREN IN THE WOOD.—The Melbourne correspondent of the London Times writes under date of October last: "An incident which I most shortly relate, if only for the interest it may excite among the readers of your paper, occurred within the last few days in the Gippsland district. Discussions have frequently arisen in the colonies as to the capacity of the native race for improvement, and the fact to which I proceed to refer throws light on such a question. Some time since, a man named Mr. Mr. Dugald Smith, at Rhodonin, Gippsland, left his home in the bush, leaving his wife and his two boys and a girl, aged respectively 7, 5, the children of a carpenter. The mother, who had been confined a few days before, left her house Duff, wandered by themselves into the bush, and, after wandering about for some time, they had often gone out on the same errand before, they lost their way, and, as the darkness of night came on, became alarmed, and a search commenced. Their father, accompanied by many neighbors, scoured the woods, even to all the country in every direction for nights and days in search of the children, but in vain. Some weeks after, the principal blacks was obtained, these people possessing an intimate knowledge of the bush, and set out in search. On the second day, the children were found, alive, by the blacks. These aboriginal blacks took care of them, and, as they could not speak to them, they could not tell them how to find their home. Further on, after the children had been found, they were carefully overlooked by the children themselves. On the first night they were found they were laid down and the direction of the faintest hope of their ever being again seen alive. No wonder, as the little creature had strips of her scribed as having been found lying all of a row on a clump of fern, covered with a native blanket, and the children, carefully wrapped in his sister's frock. They appeared to be in a state of perfect contentment. The boy had taken the eldest child to sit up but fell back. But this was not the end of the matter. The children were found, but they could only just feebly groan 'Father!' The youngest, she was dead, and the boy, on the point of death. Both were quite unable to speak. The boy's shirt you came for us soon!' The boy was dead. The girl, who was about quite gone, when lifted up could only murmur, 'Give me a drink.' No wonder, as the little creature had strips of her frock, at the elder boy said, 'to cover them for he was crying with cold.' The children have since recovered, and are rapidly recovering. They were both found in a state of perfect nakedness, had only one piece of water during the whole time they were out, and the boy had eaten the flesh of one wild bird. The girl for the next week, in all nine days and eight nights. The children have since been under the care of the Rev. Mr. Hagenauer, and it is hoped that they will not be suffering from the effects of their protracted exposure."

KATION OF GENERAL BUTLER'S ARMY, DECEMBER 25, 1864.—[SKETCHED BY JOHN EVERDING.]

NOW.

RISE! for the day is passing,
And you lie dreaming on:
The others have buckled their armor,
And forth to the fight are gone;
A place in the ranks awaits you,
Each man has some part to play;
The Past and the Future are nothing
In the face of the stern To-day.

Rise from your dreams of the Future,
Of gaining some hard-fought field;
Of storming some airy fortress,
Or bidding some giant yield.
Your Future has deeds of glory,
Of honor (God grant it may!);
But your arm will never be stronger,
Or the need so great as To-day.

RISE! if the Past detains you,
Her sunshine and storms forget;
No chains so unworthy to hold you
As those of a vain regret;
Sad or bright, she is lifeless forever,
Cast her pale ghost arms away,
Nor look back, save to learn the lesson
Of a nobler strife To-day.

RISE! for the day is passing;
The low sound that you scarcely hear
Is the enemy marching to battle—
Arise! for the foe is here:
Stay not to sharpen your weapons,
Or the hour will strike at last,
When, from dreams of a coming battle,
You may wake to find it past!

THE GHOSTS OF BOLDEN TOWER.

SINCE I had been a young fellow of fourteen years of age my life had been almost entirely passed at sea. I had been long accustomed to the icebergs of the polar seas, and the burning and fervent glare of the tropic waters. Since I left home mighty changes had taken place. I had never before paid a visit to Bolden Tower, for my uncle had been a solitary man, who loved mathematics as much as he disliked society, and who never thought of inviting his friends to his house, for the simple reason that he did not want to be bored, and preferred to be alone. My brother Tom had only succeeded to his inheritance about a year and a half. He was the reverse of his uncle. In the first place, he was a married man, and had a most assortment of rosy-cheeked children, who shouted through the old fortress house all day long, and made his table blossom with their merry faces. In the next place, he loved society dearly, and hated mathematics cordially. In the next place, Tom was always inviting his relatives, young and old, and making much much of them when they came. Without any letter or notice I had arrived at Bolden Tower, fresh from a tempestuous voyage, the first for many long years. The house was full of attractions for me. It contained Tom himself, his pretty wife, and my many nephews and nieces, and also a couple of sisters younger than myself, whose dear faces I had not seen for many weary years. When at sea I had heard, of course, in letters from home, of the taking possession of Bolden Tower, and one of my sisters had on one occasion written me a letter which read like a page from some old romance, so full was it of old legends and stories which had been told them about the house in which they had come to live. "We have a real fete about, though that is absurd, to be sure," wrote my sister Clara, "and for the first week after we went to the Tower, Mary and myself set up all night, and did not dare to go to bed, but slept in the day time instead; but we have never seen any thing, and have since learned that the supernatural things are confined to an old part of the original building which stands in the stable-yard, and is quite disconnected with it. And as not been the case, I am quite sure Mary and myself could not have ventured to live with Tom, much as we love him, and you, and the dear children."

I was a sailor, and therefore ought to be superstitious, but superstitious I was not. I had seen many strange sights and met with strange things on the high seas and in savage countries, and it seemed to me that ghosts could scarcely be stranger than many things of which I had become familiar. I had come home from the sea unexpectedly. I had emptied my pockets of small change in the toy-shops of the sea-ports where I landed, and my purchases had made the coming of the sailor-uncle a very joyful occasion to my young nephews and nieces. To my dear brother-in-law and sister-in-law I was received with open arms, and bewildered with embraces. The meeting and the welcome were elaborately purchased by years of sea-faring hardships and loneliness. But not only my relatives were inhabitants of Bolden Tower for the festive season, the place was full, for Tom had determined to keep open house, and it seemed as if he had invited all the people he knew, so full the old house seemed.

"Too full," said Tom, "for I'll be hanged if I know where you are to sleep, Jack."

"I decline," said Mary, "it will be just like all the stories of ghosts which one reads of—the haunted house always are full except one room, which the ghost has; and this is a haunted house, too—"

"With this difference—that we have never been disturbed by ghosts, male or female, and that the part they said it appeared is separated from all our bedrooms. There's the haunted part, Jack," said Tom, pointing out of the bay-window of the breakfast-room to the ivy-grown and detached building in the stable-yard. "That's where the ghosts hang out, they say; and, laugh as you like, I declare I think there must be truth in the legend after all; for one night, as I was coming home—"

"Oh, Mr. Bolden! now don't frighten us—pray don't!" called out a nervous, middle-aged lady, who was of the party.

"I assure you, madam, what I am going to say is the truth," continued Tom. "I was coming home from fishing very late, and I rode into the stable-yard and gave my rods to Joseph; and just as he was taking them we both of us heard a peculiar low cry. Where it came from we could not tell, but we both thought from the upper room of the building yonder. At the same moment there was a rattling sound, as if some one was trying to open the windows in the upper story, and as the moon was bright at that moment, I declare I saw quite plainly something white at the far window there, under the clock. I know I felt quite shaky, and I know also that Joseph was so terrified that he broke the top joint of my best fly-rod, and ran into the house as fast as his legs could carry him. Now I'll be bound Jack here would be ready to laugh at the same thing, though he pretends to be so courageous, as all sailors do."

"What is the room on the ground-floor in the old building used for?" I asked.

"Oh, we use that as a lumber-room, and, as we keep up and fire nothing more usually, it isn't a bad place to have a smoke in—in the day-time."

"And the upper room?"

"Well, we intended when we first came to let the men-servants sleep there, and so had it fitted up, beds and all; but as that is the portion of the building which is said to be haunted we soon found that neither love nor money would tempt any of the servant tribe to sleep there, for if they could avoid it, go past its walls after dark."

"I'll tell you what I'll do," I said. "I'll sleep there, and see what these ghosts of ours are made of."

"Pooh! nonsense!" exclaimed my brother. "I would not allow you for the world, Jack."

"But I am determined," said I, "and I have never seen any spectres yet, nor slept in a haunted room; and this is a thing to be done on one's life, as I take it, just for the sake of saying so."

"Oh, don't be so foolish, dear," said Clara, and my child or Mary will be sure to be very ill after it up, and you can have our bed; won't we, Mary?"

"If you say any more I will go back to sea again, and never come back to see you at all," I said, as I got to try the haunted chamber, and I beg it as a favor. Put a fire in for me; let me have a bottle of claret and a comfortable arm-chair, and I can warm myself before the fire, and get sleepy and comfortable, and then I don't think the spirits will harm me. But sleep there I must."

This determination had the desired effect upon the party. Tom finally agreed to my proposal that I should sleep in the haunted chamber, but it was also arranged that the chamber should be then and there made as comfortable as possible, and that I should wile away the time with my sisters—a young ensign who was staying in the house, and who had been shooting pheasants all day—promising to come and participate my fate, and sleep in the room with me. My sisters would insist upon this, and as the young fellow in question, though overladen with modesty, did not dare to disobey when Clara spoke, he agreed at once.

"They surely won't face the army and navy," he said; "and we can talk ourselves to sleep over our claret and a pipe."

All this was arranged in the morning, and the day passed in a very lively and festive manner. We were dancing, playing at forfeits—even turning in tremblers, flirting and making love to the tune of plenty of materials; and unlimited loo and speculation were indulged in by most of us, when our legs were tired. I did not see any more of Joseph, for there was a charming little girl, the daughter of a neighboring proprietor, in whom—the girl, not the proprietor—I found myself becoming deeply interested, and whom I succeeded in amusing with all sorts of queer stories of foreign countries, and a few tableaux-papa-mamma style.

My brother noticed it. "I don't think it's 'canny' for you two to be paying such attention to one another," he said, frowning. "I know about the connection between our families long ago—"

"Ah!" I said, looking at the girl as deeply as Miss Heronside herself, "is there a legend about the two families—what is it?"

"Well, you know, Tom; "but no—it is connected with the precious ghost business; and as I want to test it's truth of the matter, I will not let you know till after you have been in your room here slept in the room, or else you may get dreaming about what I tell you."

"But you surely not going to sleep in that dreadful room, Mr. Bolden?" said Miss Heronside, with a beseeching look.

"Honor bright, I have pledged myself to it, and my soldier comrade the same," I answered.

Miss Heronside looked much disturbed, but said no more, and the evening passed away. After her father's carriage, promising to dine with us on the following day.

Eleven o'clock came, twelve o'clock came, and the ensign and myself went out to our bedroom. My sisters bade me good-night with grave countenances, and declared they should not sleep for thinking of our unpleasant quarters.

When my comrade and I arrived in our chamber, to which we ascended by a flight of steep stone steps, which had perhaps at one time been covered in, but now wound outside the building to the upper story, we found a monstrous fire blazing, a table set out with wine, a can for mulling claret, if we so desired, standing by the fire, a bright carpet over the portion of the floor nearest the fire, and two comfortable arm-chairs. The room was floored with light, the glass and wainscoting reflected the fire leaped and crackled, so that we involuntarily exclaimed, in almost the same breath, "What a jolly room!"

We locked, bolted, and barred the door, which was the only inlet to the room, tried the window fastenings; then my companion pulled out a pistol and laid it on the table.

"A pistol?" said I.

"Why, yes. I promised them that I would fire a pistol if we were frightened by any thing, and besides, some one might be inclined to play a trick on us, knowing we are here, and I should like to wing 'em if they do so; but we don't seem likely to meet with any thing here but comfort; so let's fill our pipes."

The room was bare and commonplace; there were two small beds just for one person each, situated one at each end of the room, the window being in the middle of the room, and the door nearly opposite the window. There were no ponderous hangings, rich cornices, old paintings frowning from the walls, as in many of the haunted rooms that I had ever read or heard of. The walls were whitewashed and bare, the floor oak, the chimney had been large, but was bricked up, and a modern grate inserted. If it had not been for the fire and carpet, it would indeed have been a very cheerless room. As it was, it was delightful, and not a bit fearsome.

We went to bed. According to my usual habit I scarcely lay down than I fell fast asleep. I had been too much accustomed to the howling of storms to be disturbed by any human wind. Nay, I question whether the very noise did not really lull me to rest.

I can not say how long I had been asleep, but I suddenly woke. Opening my eyes I found that the fire had died down, and that the room was in comparative darkness, the wind had ceased, but the rain and sleet were pouring down outside. The Ensign was snoring. I was just closing my eyes again, when I was attracted by what seemed a gentle motion of the door. I stared at it. Was it the flickering light of the fire? No; the door was evidently undergoing a push, but just circumstance caused a sudden feeling of fear to pass over me. The door was a heavy one, and always creaked and groaned on its hinges whenever the Ensign or I opened or shut it. It was now opening as quietly and noiselessly as if gliding over snow. We had made the door quite fast, too. Who—what could it be? At that moment the recollection that I was in the haunted chamber passed over me, and I felt a chill strike to my very bones. Slowly, quietly the door opened and opened. I stared at it with a species of fascination which I could not overcome. Nothing—not even a glance toward the Ensign's bed, I could see that he had raised his head, and was also staring at the moving door. When the door had half opened a white figure, seeming to creep out of the blackness of the night, appeared—but a distinct figure, a more image through which I could see, as it glided in the door it left behind; far more terrible than a perfect figure—the luminous image of a man, which said at once, as plainly as form can speak, I AM MY NORMAL. The face was pale, the eyes cold dead-glared. Oh, horror! the eyes, the head turned toward me, toward the part of the room in which I slept. Oh, horror! the figure moved toward my bed. I was seized, grappled, with a nameless terror that I can not hope ever to overcome. I could not move or cry—I would have given worlds to have leaped from my bed and out of the window, but I was quite powerless. Nearer, nearer; the cold, glassy eyes were fixed upon my face, the chill breath of its presence struck to my very bones—it came quite close to my pillow: my level sight could not, did, my heart almost ceased to beat. Crowning horror of all, its shadowy hand passed over the bed, as if feeling—no, handling—passed over my brow with the cold, clammy touch of a corpse. In my intense fear my reason was surely leaving me. Pass—feeling—the figure moved, passed over the bed, and then, turning, the figure passed swiftly into the centre of the room. When there, I saw another figure, more transparent like the other, luminous like the other; but this figure was the figure of a young, slight girl, with streaming hair and nightdress. I could notice even then, in spite of my deadly terror, the wondrous beauty of her pallid face. I could also notice that there was something in that face which spoke of Violet Heronside: a hint, a trace, a family shadow, call it. The look of recognition in the face was awful, and I have never forgotten—can never forget. That look haunts me still. Shall I ever outlive the images of that horrible night?

The male spectre appeared to be dragging the other along the floor toward the window. The window slided open as noiselessly as the door had opened, and the two figures seemed to glide, or fall, or pass together into the open air, but just at that moment a cock-crow from the yard broke the room. I heard this, and close thereupon the loud report of a pistol. My brain reeled, and I fell back senseless.

I recovered myself in the breakfast-room of the Tower; Tom and his wife, and my sisters about me, in half undress, chafing my hands and bathing my head.

It was just daybreak, the watery rays imperfectly lighted the room, and all faces around me were very pale. The Ensign was at a little distance, leaning against the mantle-piece, and as white as ashes.

When I recovered sufficiently to be informed how I got there, I was told that Tom had heard the report of the pistol in the Ensign, with more presence of mind than I possessed, had fired at the spectre, and had jumped out of bed, knowing that something must be wrong, had compelled a terrified footman to accompany him to our chamber, and on arriving there had found the door and window open, the Ensign sitting upright in his bed trembling like an aspen leaf, and myself lying senseless.

I said not a word about my dreadful draught of hot brandy-and-water, which seemed scarcely to have any effect upon my shaken system. Every now and then a memory of what I endured passed across me, and I shook in every limb, and my teeth chattered in my head.

I was wrapped up in blankets, and set in an armchair in front of the kitchen fire; and there I dozed till breakfast time.

Of course the numerous visitors knew nothing of what had happened till they assembled round the breakfast-table; but before a word was said the haggard faces of the Ensign and myself had betrayed us.

The tale was told, not by me—for I could not bear to speak of it—but by the Ensign, who had not undergone the extremest horror of all, the passing of the cold corpse-hand over my face. A chill seemed to pass over the circle as they listened to the narration, and although it was broad daylight, many glanced fearfully about them, as if dreading a ghost in their neighbors.

"Then," said Tom, "there is truth in the legend after all about the two families."

Remembering the inexplicable likeness in the female spectre to Violet, I eagerly asked for the legend. Its substance was as follows: An ancestor of Tom's, in the reign of Henry VII., had wed and won the heiress of the Heronsides. It seems that ours was the poorer family, and that the old Heronside was averse to the match. My ancestor had carried off his bride, and married her in private, then brought her home to the chamber in which we slept, then a noble chamber and hung with rich tapestry.

On the third night after their arrival home, the angry father had himself come to their bridal bower in the dead of night, had opened the door by means of false keys, stabbed the bridegroom in his bed, dragged his daughter from his side, and thrust her from the window: in doing so he had overbalanced himself, and both were picked up dead. Such was the tragic tale, and such the foundation for a feud which had lasted for many generations, and had but recently been patched up.

"By Jove," said the Ensign, "I am not exactly a coward, but I certainly would not sleep in that room again for a marshal's baton."

"Nor I to be made Admiral of the Blue," I answered; and so we slept on the breakfast-room floor that night.

I saw Miss Heronside a day or so after, and told her the story. She was strangely moved, and the tears burst into her beautiful eyes. I ventured—we were cousins—to kiss them softly away. "Can not we heal the old feud, and atone for the old crime?" I asked, softly; and the happiness of my life I owe to the gentle answer—"Yes."

OVER THE STONES.

On we wander, with smiles or sighs,
Laughter ringing, or tears in our eyes,
Aches and pains in our stiffening knees,
We care now only for rest and ease;
Friends have gone to the distant zones,
Yet we're still pattering over the stones.

Youth—he many are gone since then,
Past and present by angels and men,
Melted to gases, pale and thin,
With their follies and faults, and virtue and sin;
Yet still in our ears sound their friendly tones,
As we go pattering over the stones.

The streets are changed, and the houses too,
Forgotten the good that we tried to do;
The sea has some of our friends once dear,
Earth has swallow'd the rest, we fear;
And all will have fled from these scenes—
Yet we're still pattering over the stones.

A BLACK AFFAIR.

WELL, thank 'e, Sir, I don't mind if I do. A little drop of rum, Sir, if you please. Rum's my favorite liquor. I don't always think, Sir, that I could write one of them Christmas burlesques stunning. You won't mind if I pan, Sir, for I'm fond of fun. Well, between you and me, Sir, I'm a bun, Sir, as sure as a gun, Sir. You see, it comes natural to me, like. Well, as I was a saying, it is three-and-twenty years since I first took to the darkey business. I was a bit of a boy then, and did Jim Crow all over the country. I what you call "starred it" throughout him. When first went into the country he found I had been before him. All the boys and gals, Sir, were turning about and saying, "Look and doin' just as Jim Crow." Says they saw Dan. I was the man, Sir, that spoilt his plan, Sir, for I was the boy that could can, Sir. Well, Sir, I was a boy, you don't like it. But as I was a saying, Sir, I made my first appearance in Jim Crow—little Jim Crow they called me—in a black affair, as a page of travers. Lor' bless you, Sir, what a thing is experience! At that time of day we used to black our faces and hands, instead of which we improving no better; but since then, Sir, such is the march of intellect, Sir, science has revealed burnt cork to be more portable and highly invaluable. Whatever there may be a wanting, Sir, to man here below, it's not cork. According to my own experience I can say in every where, but I regret to say not bottles with something in them. But cork is all pervading, and with lucifers, which I am also more than partial to, where you are with Ethiopia in your waistcoat pocket!

I began with the bones; rose rapidly, owing to my natural talent for the tambourine, advanced with giant strides to the banjo; and at last attained to the proud eminence of the concertina. I might have retired on a competence long before now, Sir, if it hadn't been for the— But why should I mention the word? What is it that conquers all mankind and makes cowards of us all, as Shakspeare observes? What is it? Why the fe-males. Hellen was the cause of Rob Roy's destruction, as the poet says. The fe-males was the ruin of me; at least one fe-male was. I mean to say that one fe-male was my wife.

She was a fine woman, Sir, and she is a fine woman as ever you would desire to clap your eyes upon in a summer's day; a foot and a half taller than me, but no ambition, and such a raping temper. For you, Sir, or any gunt as wasn't professional, she would have been just the thing. Tall, Sir, high action, a fine figure-head, and a mole on her left cheek, but domestic. That's where we didn't hit it—she was domestic; and when a woman as is married to a professional is domestic she can't account to be out of her sight. When you are away performing she gets jealous; not of any body in particular, as far as I can make out, but of the public in general. A domestic wife, Sir, in my walk of life, Sir, tends to strife, Sir—beg your pardon, I'm sure, Sir; but it's a natural gunius which there's no keeping down; always was witty, Sir; can't help it.

My wife turned out downright unreasonable. She was for regular hours in the business. "Ten to five, or a little arter," she used to say, "it is very good hours for a man to be in business, and can get a red man ought to be home and abed by ten o'clock." Well, you know, Sir, in my line that sort of thing won't do. If Drop Light Lou is your line your must do the best you can; and if you want a sweet-heart, why darkey is your man. Leastwise, Sir, I mean that in my line you can't choose your hours, or you can't choose your district. As a rule, there's nothing to be done in the nigger line until after dinner. Organ is the only thing in that way that people will stand directly after breakfast. You want a good foundation of roast beef or ards and something to drink before you are in a humor for the niggers. And do you know, Sir, I fancy that the more people have to drink the better they are for our performance. And so it is, Sir, that our best time is at night. I used to do a very good night business with a song, of which, being the composer of it, I was the head and director—a very good business, Sir, until I got married. But I hadn't been married a week before Mrs. G. began to row me about being out late at night.

"My dear Maria," I says to her, "it's business; it's your living, my dear, and mine too."

"Don't tell me," she says; "there's no proper business to be done at this time of night, and if I had known the sort of life you was going to lead me I shouldn't have married you."

"Well, Maria," I would say to her, "I'm sure I never deceived you as to my line of life."

"You told me you was a hartist," she says.

"I did," I says; "but did I ever deceive you as to the nature of the hart? Didn't I tell you as a straightforward manner that I was in the musical way, that my instrument was the concertina, and my line," I says, "it came a-scarting you in a clean face and my best Sunday-going suit; but when you remarked as how you found my neck dirty I made a clean breast of it, and confess to the burnt cork on my bended knees? And what did you say to me, Maria? Why, you take me by the hand and you say, 'Rise, Joseph, rise; it does not become you to kneel thus to a fragile woman? Love,' you says, 'is superior to all art, and I'd love you all the same if you was the Hottentot Venus.'"

Yes, Sir, I was candid with Maria, and I was candid with the landlady, which had been in the boardinghouse line and seen better days, but was now reduced through misfortunes. It is true that Maria's tea kept a snuggling presented to her by subscription by the members of her dutiful family, and that her pa, being unequal to exertion, was in the poorhouse; but having paid taxes and kept the parochahy in better times, I knew what was due to them, and, on aspiring to Maria's sad, stated all circumstances—family, parentage, profession, and expected earnings.

I remember well, Sir, what the old gentlemen said to me on the wedding-day. I went down to the poor-house for him at ten o'clock and brought him up in a cab to give his daughter away. And he gave her away, Sir, cheerfully—which was very generous of him, considering that she was all his property. And, coming out of church, the old gentleman says to me:

"Joseph," says he, "things has been said, but not by me. Mind, I won't see as said Maria was going to marry beneath her. There's no pride about me; but the old woman, you know, was connected with the aristocracy, and, though brought down, Joseph, her notions are high. She didn't quite like it at first, and might have said something. But don't you take any notice, she'll be reconciled to it in time."

So she was, Sir; for the very next Sunday the old lady took me and Maria to tea, and we had our own tea and sugar, and a new cottage loaf, and warmed the old lady up with a glass of gin, and she was reconciled to me. So you can't say that there was any family misunderstanding, can you, Sir? It was all fair and square; Maria knew what I was, and I precisely knew what I was, and they took me for what I was.

Maria could not deny it; yet often when I went home last night with high strikes, fly at me like a cat and tear my clothes off my back, get hold of the tails of my coat—them long comic tails as we wear, Sir—and off they'd come like tinder; and as for my hair, it was a pity her, but that being a horsehair wig descried of her, and only aggravated her the more, when she'd chuck the wig in the fire and seize me by the real hair, pulling out handfuls. There was no pacifying her, Sir; soft words weren't a bit of use. I've took home something nice for supper, thinking that would prevent a row; but it didn't. Once I had a bit of boiled pork and pease-puddin', and she took up the pease-puddin' in handfuls and threw it at me like mud. Pease-puddin' ain't a nice thing, Sir, to be comped with. So I took her home a velvet bonnet all over roses and ribbons and she's danced upon it, Sir.

When I've been very late, and frightened to go home, I've got two or three of my mates to go in with me; sometimes I've took the whole troupe. But last there was, Sir, it wouldn't have made no difference if I had gone home guarded by a regiment of soldiers, or a whole division of the police. Maria let us have it all round, generally with the banjo over the head. You see she had no sympathy with hart, Sir, didn't understand it. Her idea of work was washing, and ironing, and cleaning up the house. "Fine thing for you," she would say, "gallivanting about, seeing pleasure, while I'm at home here, toiling and slaving." As a general rule, Sir, I don't think women ought to sing hart.

But the worst of it was that all this interfered with business. I'm a man that likes peace and quietness myself, and I'd do any thing rather than have a row. I've sat many a night in the cold on the stairs waiting for Maria's temper to cool down. But if you treat upon a worm, Sir, it will turn, especially if you interfere with it in business, and humiliate it before the public at large. And that's half of what Maria used to do. She'd give a good bit of money to be picked up in the season at the watering-places. But I never could go; Maria wouldn't let me.

"If you go, Joseph," she used to say, "I go."

Well, of course I couldn't drag Maria about with me on the country; it would have been double expense, and hartists in our line don't always find it easy to get lodgings. Ours, Sir, is an awkward walk to assert as regards rows, for all being professionals we like to keep ourselves quiet when we retire into private life. In fact, it would be for public characters like us to go to the Metropolitan.

Well, the consequence was that my mates went without me, and I was left in New York at the dull season of the year to do the best I could singlehanded. But one nigger ain't no use, Sir; it's true the concertina is scientific, but without the bones and the bones it's nothing. I did very bad, and could get little more than a crust. But Maria didn't care. She considered that I was in better a crust of bread-and-cheese and be home and a-bed at ten o'clock than fried oysters and gin with gallivanting.

It was all jealousy. Yet I never give her any occasion, Sir. Never. Of course I palavered the gals, and I always made some complimentary speech out of their missus's pin-money; but it was in the way of business. It wasn't love, Sir, it was money.

What I am going to tell you now, Sir, is a great event, and I dare say some day it will be mentioned in History.

It was in the dull season, and I had not done a stroke of business for some time. I had been out on a concert, and was thinking, thinking, thinking—as I generally do when I'm in bad luck—that I might possibly find a purse or a bundle of notes lying in the road. You see, Sir, as I was turning a street corner I saw something white lying on the pavement. My heart was in my mouth. I thought it was the bundle of notes at last. But it wasn't. It was only a lady's cambric handkerchief. But that was quite enough for me. I made sure all round it. I am no judge of lace myself, but I thought that it was likely to be the real article. So I picked it up, and put it in my pocket, and said nothing to nobody. I intended to give it to Maria when I got home; but she had a little bit of supper ready for me, and was so pleasant as never, that I quite forgot all about it. I went to bed without mentioning the handkercher.

As I was dozing off, Maria, who had stopped up to put things to rights, suddenly came up to the bedside and shook me. "Joseph," she said.

"Well," I said, "what is it?"

"Joseph," she repeated; as d I knew by her tone that there was something up.

I opened my eyes and saw Maria standing beside me with the handkercher in her hand. She had been to my pockets and found it.

"What's this?" she said.

"A handkercher," I said.

"A handkercher!" she said. "Whose handkercher is it?"

"I don't know, I'm sure," I said. "I picked it up in the street, and was going to give it to you, only I forgot it."

"How do you look, Joseph, when you're telling a lie?" she said.

"What do you mean?" I said.

"I'll tell you what I mean," she said. "Some woman give you this, Joseph. You've said nothing to me some time; but you can't deceive me. I have the hockular proof."

"Oh, how can you think such a thing, Maria?" I said. "I'm sure I never gave you any cause."

"This handkercher!" she said; and she looked at me quite awful.

Well, Sir, I took a bitter oath that I had picked it up, but she wouldn't have it.

"Why, Joseph," she screamed, "said; 'it's real lace, d dare say it belongs to a Fifth Avenue heiress."

"Ah," she says; "it ain't the first time I've heard of hartists taking to deceive in love with professionals. Joseph, you're a willin."

It cut me to the quick to be called a name like that, and my conscience as accused me, but I had nothing would parley her. She worked herself up into high strikes in no time. Thinking that she would soon get tired out, I lay quiet a bit, quiet and never said a word. But that wouldn't do. She got up in a fury, threw my wig into the fire as stood, stamped upon my concertina case, and then pulled all the clothes off me. She went on like a mad woman, Sir, and roused the whole house.

"I'll go home to my parents," she said.

"Don't be foolish," I said. "You know your ma is out a washing, and the poor-house is shut long ago; they won't let you see the old gentleman to-night."

"It comes of marrying of you beneath me in station," she said.

Now she had never said that to me before; but I knew now that it had been hurled in her breast, and that she had been thinking of it for years.

"Oh, Maria!" I said. "I never thought that you would have thrown that up in my face. If you do come of a high family," I said, "love's a leveler."

"Love!" she says; "do you dare to talk to me of love, false one?"

"I ain't a false one, Maria; I'm your true loving husband," I said.

"The handkercher!" she said, holding it up like an accusing spectre. "Go to your heiress, go!" And with that she flounced out of the room, and sat half the night on the stairs—weeping and sobbing and beating the boards with her heels, so that nobody could get a wink of sleep in the house.

When she come up in the morning she was as cold as a frog; but quiet. She never spoke all breakfast-time; but after I had blacked my face, and just as I was curling a paper collar, she rises, and draws herself up to her full height, and says:

"Joseph," she says, "I'll never live under the same roof with you no more. I'll have a divorce."

"Very well," I says; "if that's your temper have a divorce. Only it strikes me that it won't be much to it when you have a good deal more money than we've got," I said.

All I had, Sir, was a fifty cent stamp, and though I knew that divorce had been much reduced in price, I didn't think they had come down so low as that.

"Don't you think," I said, "it would be cheaper to refer it to arbitration? I don't mind standing by what you ps says."

"Oh, I don't say," she said; "you and pa are very thick because you give him bacca. I chose Mrs. ——."

"Very well," I said; "you have ma and I'll have pa."

So that was agreed upon, and Maria put on her bonnet and went off for her ma, and I, without waiting to wash the black off my face, went up to the opposite house for my pa.

The first thing the old gentleman said, on getting outside the gates, was, "Ain't we going to take a coach, Joseph?"

"No, father," I says, "coaches is for weddings; but it's divorce that's on to-day; and under those circumstances you don't feel inclined to go to the expense."

The old gentleman being rather weak on the pins, I took my arm, and came to get down to where I lodged, and Maria and her ma were there waiting for us.

"Here you are," I said; "here's my reference."

"And here's mine," said Maria, pointing to her ma, who, having her sleeves up, had evidently been summoned down in the middle of her washing.

"Now," I said, "go ahead."

Well, Sir, of course Maria had no facts to go upon, except the handkercher, and the handkercher in my pocket. I tore the case for the prosecution all to tatters, and Maria hadn't got a rag to stand upon except the handkercher.

"Now," I says, "pa, what's your verdict?"

"Not guilty, my lord, without leaving the box."

"Hear, hear," I says. "And what's yours, ma?"

"Well," she says, talking quite proud, just like her daughter, both having been at boarding-school, "I should like to see the handkercher."

Maria always kept things tidy.

"Why," she says, "it's the finest cambric, with real lace round it; it's worth five dollars if it's worth a penny."

"Very well, then, mum, what do you say?"

"Well," replied Maria's ma, "I say pawn it."

"Them is my sentiments exactly," I says; "pawn it, and let's have rumpsteak and onions for dinner."

Maria vowed that her own flesh and blood had turned against her; but when I brought in a quart of rum and a pint and a half of old ale, and she'd had a drop, she came round a little, and at last agreed to go and pawn the handkercher. Then we had a nice bit of hot dinner, and the old gentleman got quite convivial, and sang Away with Melancholy, Sir, in a most pleasant an afternoon, Sir, as I'd wish to see.

After that happiness, Sir, was restored to my domestic hearth; only, I couldn't help thinking that things was a deal too pleasant to last. Maria was all sugar, never scolded, never was jealous, and was always singing. It couldn't make it out at all. Formerly she had despised my line of hart, and called my songs nonsense and rubbish. But now she was a singing of them every day, and beautiful she sang them too; especially Lucy Neal and the Old Folks at Home, which was all the go then. I never thought that she had such talent.

But what's her little game? I thought to myself. She's been in a jealous fury and she's dropped the words, and though she doesn't say much, she's always a singing; and two or three times when I come in unexpected I've caught her getting away some finery that she'd been making, as if she didn't want me to see it.

One afternoon, with I came in to my bit of dinner, there was nobody in the room. I knocked at the door of the lodger on the same landing, a young woman in the millinery line, and asked if she knew where my missus was? "All right," she says; "she'll be with you directly."

I went back to my meal and sat down, and in about five minutes the door opened and somebody came in. I looked round and saw before me—what do you think, Sir? A tall young woman dressed in short red petticoat, with a turban on her head, and her face blacked!

There was no mistaking that figure-head. It was Maria.

"How do you like me now?" she says.

"Why, Maria," I says, "whatever are you up to?"

In answer to that, Sir, she whips up an old tambourine, and strikes up—

"Rose, Rose, Sambo come,
Make a little fire in de kerk room;
Oh, Rose, coal-black Rose,
I'll marry you before
If I don't love Rose."

And then she did the tambourine with her hands, and giggled it to the time, and banged it against her head and elbows just as if she had been born to it.

"Will that suit?" she says.

"Why, Maria," I said to her quite serious, "what does this mean?"

"Well, I do says, "it means, Joseph, that I don't think you draw by yourself, and I'm going to help you. What you want," she says, "is the pie-rots element in your performances."

"And do you mean to say, Maria, that you're going out with me like that?"

"Yes," she says, "I do mean to say it. In future, Joseph, where you go I go. I'm sure it will improve the business; and being with you, I can always have my eye upon you."

And she did go out with me, Sir; and that was how fee-males was first introduced into the nigger business. Lots of fellows have claimed the honor of the invention; but it was me as did it, me and Maria.

There's lots of fee-males in the profession now, but Maria was the first; and if you are in the History line, perhaps you will be good enough to put it down.

Thank you, Sir, the same as before, with lemon.

QUERIES FOR THE NAVAL SCHOOLS.

Where a boat puts off for fresh meat, does it go on a leg of mutton sail?

How should you proceed if you were ordered to rig—the market?

Has the "christening" of a ship any thing to do with its "conversion?"

NO CURE AND HIGH PAY.—Quack medicine not only does and cures but empirics who have recourse to it, but makes them worse. The practice of a Quack Doctor is the most objectionable of all time-cures.

The Erie Railroad, we understand, is in good run-in order. To make sure of the fact, take a ride through Bergen tunnel.

An Irish judge, after holding the sentence at Tipperary, made a turn of the bench during the circuit. He there saw, with astonishment, a calendar of prisoners without one gentleman to represent the whole. He pointed out the contrast to his clerk, who contemptuously remarked, "The Welsh have a monopoly of gentility."

"PAPA," said a youngster, "what is punctuation?" "It is the act of putting stops, my child. "Then I wish you would go and do it to the cellar and punctuate the cider barrel, as the cider is running all over the floor."

ACCORDING TO GUNTHER.—We learn that our worthy Mayor has refrained from reading the Fourth of July riot on the ground that it might lead him to entertain contracted views. Several city politicians are following his wise example.

MORAL REFLECTIONS BY A POLICEMAN.—"It seems to me that, after burying one, the undertaker improved method of winding up the night is reeling it home."

What is the most difficult thing in the world?—To find out the most difficult thing in the world.

Why is swearing like an old coat?—Because it's a bad habit.

SNOWDAR.—It is said that the tree of Florida, the most beautiful of flowers, emits no fragrance; the bird of Paradise, the most beautiful of birds, gives no melody; the grapes of Eschol, the finest of trees, yields no fruit; desolate, the thinnest of rivers, is not navigable; and the rose, the loveliest creatures in the world, are very often diteless—they are so.

GREAT SCHOOL.—A lady we know was startled the other day by being told that some one was writing below for her "body." Dress-makers should be careful.

A witty saying of M. Dumas, the younger, is amusing to-day. The Emperor is said to have invited him to end the plague, adding to her courtesy an assurance that all the genius were to have full liberty in the matter. "There is a pity, then, Monsieur," said M. Dumas, "that all France is not already invited."

JEROME JAYE, in her recent "Talks on Women's Topics," says that in almost every instance where a man marries a sensible woman, it is after he has met with a severe disappointment in not marrying a fool.

NEW ORTHOGRAPHY.—The lady's-maid of a fashionable churchgoer, whose style of dress far exceeds that of her mistress, having occasion to write an order to a performer in waiting, addressed the letter to the maid as dowm bottles of "O Dick Alone" (eau-de-Cologne).

A SOLEMN FACT.—It is difficult to make the pot boil with the fire of genius.

WHY is the letter T like an island?—Because it is in the middle of water.

EVE, according to Milton, kept silence in Eden to hear her husband talk. There have been no Eves since.

"In the Ottom of 18—, my friend, the editor of the Hashfordville Gazette and Mail, I was a perfect stranger to him and go and dig his bates, and he axed me to ride for him round his business. Accordingly I jumped up his Bizzer and commenced. It didn't take me a great while to learn the whole stuff from A to Izzard—one reason, and I there I'd ride up to the next town on a little mule, to get my Bizzer which had his severely racks by my mental efforts. (This is sorter Ironical.) So I went over to the next town, and axed for the letters, and handed them to a pare. 'You a editor?' he axed, enquiring as to put of sickness. 'Yes, Sir,' I said, 'I don't I look poor enuff?' 'Just about,' said he, 'but our Read can't see you.' 'Can't, hay?' I says, 'I'll—I mean,' I 'Because,' sez I, lookin' him full in the face with a eagle eye, 'I owe no doctor now it won't pay me to begin.' And so I said and him that. Try the slowest Eale Read in the West. With a quarterly he told me to get out of his office. I paid him and went."

MIND YOUR STORE.—A clergyman was lately depicting before a deeply-interested Sunday audience the miseries of delinquency, when he astonished his hearers by exclaiming, "A young woman in my parish has married that very unlikely lad Isaiah, who is now preaching the Gospel in a state of beastly intoxication!"

If you love others, they will love you. If you speak kindly to them they will speak kindly to you. If you are frank with love, and hatred with hatred. Would you have a sound and pleasant skin, spark sweetly and pleasantly yourself.

QUESTION FOR AGRICULTURISTS.—What vegetable only continues to be eaten?—Why, of course, the lettuce alone (let us alone).

An editor, having read in another paper that there is tobacco which, if a man smokes or chews, will make him forget that he owes a shilling in the world, innocently remarked that many of his subscribers have been furnished with the article.

A young lady of our acquaintance, who likes her jokes as much as her fowls (she has fifty fighting), tells us she has a bantam so prolific that she thinks the bird is hen-sgenerable.

EDWARD EVERETT.

EDWARD EVERETT, one of the most conservative of American statesmen, and the most accomplished of American orators, died, at his residence on Summer Street, Boston, of apoplexy, on the morning of the 15th inst. In an appropriate order, dated a few hours after his death, the Secretary of State, under the direction of the President, announced this important event, and instructed the several executive departments of the government to "cause appropriate honors to be rendered to the memory of the deceased, at home and abroad, wherever the national name and authority are acknowledged."

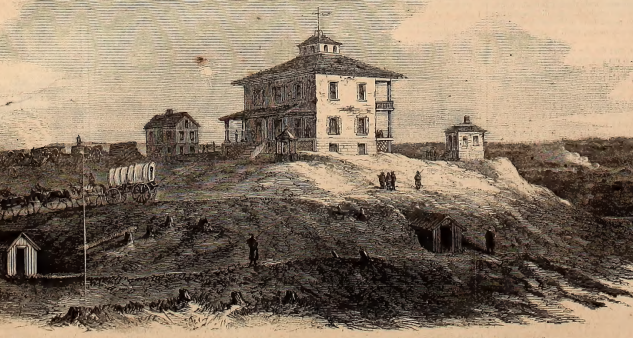
EDWARD EVERETT was born in Dorchester, Massachusetts, April 11, 1794. He was the son of a New England clergyman, the Rev. OLIVER EVERETT, and was the youngest of three brothers, one of whom, the late ALEXANDER HILL EVERETT, is well known as having filled with credit many diplomatic positions under our government. Mr. EVERETT was graduated at Harvard College at the early age of seventeen. Two years afterward he was ordained as pastor of the Brattle Street Church, in Boston, filling the place left vacant by the brilliant and lamented BUCKMINSTER. At this early stage of his career he was greatly admired for the finish and elegance of his pulpit discourses. In his college course he had chiefly distinguished himself for his aptitude as a linguist. He had been tutor at the college before his clerical appointment, and before he was twenty-one he was offered the Eliot professorship of Greek literature at Harvard, and in order fully to qualify himself for the duties of that office he traveled in Europe. Four years were occupied in travel and study, and upon his return in 1819 he entered upon a career at Harvard which was memorable not only for the enthusiasm which Mr. EVERETT created in the students of that institution, but also for the popular interest which his lectures on classic literature excited in Boston and its vicinity. For the five years following, he, in addition to his purely classical labors, conducted the North American Review.

Mr. EVERETT'S celebrated Phi Beta Kappa oration at Cambridge, in 1824, was the first of that long series of popular orations which have established his fame as the most elegant of American rhetoricians. On that occasion General LAFAYETTE was seated at his side upon the platform, and at the close of his address the speaker paid a graceful tribute to this distinguished compatriot of WASHINGTON.

Mr. EVERETT'S political life commenced with his election to Congress from the Middlesex District in 1824. He served in the House for ten years, and was during that period a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and in the 20th Congress was made chairman of that committee. In 1834 he was elected Governor of Massachusetts, an office which he held for four years. In 1840 he was appointed by President HARRISON as Minister of the United States to the British Court. Upon his return, in 1845, he accepted the presidency of Harvard College, from which, after three years, he retired, and in 1852, upon the death of Mr. WEBSTER, was appointed Secretary of State. In 1853 he took his seat in the Senate, but, owing to his ill health, was obliged to resign. Since that time his efforts have been chiefly devoted to the collection of the fund for the purchase of Mount Vernon, for which he realized the sum of more than $100,000. His ardent devotion to the Union in the time of her greatest peril is held in the grateful remembrance of the American people. His last official act was the casting of his electoral vote for President Lincoln.

Mr. EVERETT was punctual and methodical in the performance of every official duty, sensitive in temperament, and reserved and courtly in manner. While he was a man of elegant taste, he was also eminently practical, though unfitted to the bustle and strife of actual life. The last speech which Mr. EVERETT made was at Faneuil Hall, on the 9th inst., in behalf of the people of Savannah.

THE LATE EDWARD EVERETT.



CHICAGO WATER-WORKS.

THE remarkable progress of Chicago during the last decade almost surpasses belief. In 1850 the city did not exist—upon its present site there was a small wooden fort only, with two or three houses in the vicinity. Its population in 1837 was 4170, and was tripled in eight years. In 1860 the population numbered 109,260; in 1861 it was 169,353. We think that this progress has no parallel in history.

But notwithstanding this rapid growth it is only recently that means have been taken to supply the city satisfactorily with water. It has always depended on Lake Michigan for this supply; and always during a stormy season the water was filled with sediment, and at other times the water had a flavor of the Chicago River, which receives the sewage of the city.

On the 17th of March, 1864, under the auspices of Messrs. DUNCAN & GOWEN, a tunnel was commenced which, passing under the lake, will convey to the city perfectly pure water.

The well, or shaft, of this tunnel is 68 feet in depth, and about 8 feet in diameter. The tunnel under the lake is 5 feet in diameter, or height rather, its shape being oval, and is bricked up as fast as dug. The work has already proceeded a considerable distance from the shaft. Next summer a water-tight crib will be sunk out in the lake, two miles from shore. The work of sinking the large iron tube will then be undertaken. As fast as the tube is sunk the earth will be removed from the interior, and when the depth of 68 feet is reached tunneling to meet the shore will begin. The object of this arrangement will be to secure a larger quantity of pure air. Mr. JOHN P. OFFERMAN has charge of the works.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR JANUARY.

For the soirées and fêtes of the winter season just inaugurated, the modes are remarkable for the luxury and complication of the ornaments and arrangements of dresses and coiffures. Brocaded silk, satin, and velvet dresses abound; but plush velvets are preferred to the ordinary plain velvets or cloths, the last being almost entirely confined to morning dress. As for bonnets, they are reduced almost to simple fanchons, and leave but little space for the exercise of the decorative imagination of the modistes, who, however, by the introduction of peacocks' and other feathers, rich flowers, and lace, still contrive to render their bonnets as costly as before.

Short paletots and short rotondes, with or without hoods, in the redingote or paysanne style, the hood, or capuchin, will be a special characteristic of the '65 winter season, and is very gracefully shaped and ornamented with ruching in silk or in swan-down.

In the way of furs, Astrakan, particularly for trimmings, is the most fashionable, deservedly so, for it is always elegant in appearance, and admits of very general application to different parts of a lady's toilet.

Long waistbands of lace are generally en vogue for the present season; they are mostly black, but white ones are also worn. For the toilet of a ball the white lace waistband over a satin robe is extremely elegant and tasteful.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

Fig. 1. Evening Dress.—Robe of pale rose-colored taffeta, the corsage à cœurture ornamented with a sort of bauquine composed of black velvet and trimmed with jets. The sleeves are provided with a narrow trimming to match, designed as shown in the illustration.

Fig. 2. Visiting Dress.—Rawcolored robe of poplin or taffeta, with flounces either in entire antique or velvet, several shades darker than that of the dress. Sometimes a plain light-colored flounce for this style of robe, and then the trimmings just mentioned are advantageously replaced by black satin ornaments. Velvet trimmings fastened with buckle in mother-of-pearl. Light-brown velvet bonnet, trimmed with a white lace fanchon and a twisted feather.

Fig. 3. Walking Dress.—Plain but ample black silk dress. The principal feature of this toilet is the blue velvet pelisse-manile, which is finely trimmed with braidsbuerge attached by large mother-of-pearl buttons.

Fig. 4. Evening Dress.—Robe of taffeta figured in the background of our engraving is the most novel as to arrangement, and has a tablier-pouf ornamented with sautoir by one of the principal hair-dressers in Paris: the ornamentation consists of black velvet and an abundance of imitation coral beads.

THE WILMINGTON EXPEDITION AGAIN.

GENERAL BUTLER'S Report and a portion of Lieutenant-General GRANT'S correspondence with General Butler throw a new light upon the failure of the Wilmington Expedition. So far as the question of its success is concerned there is little room for argument. It is possible that an assault may have been unwise under the circumstances. And no officer, with the exception of Admiral Porter, has even by implication censured General Butler for saving the lives of his men from needless slaughter.

Still the fact remains that General Butler has been removed, and this measure is evidently been adopted at the suggestion of the Lieutenant-General. It may be that the removal had already been decided upon before the expedition was undertaken, or it may have been that some circumstances connected with General Butler's conduct of that expedition have since finally turned the balance against him. It is not difficult to believe that the latter supposition is the true one. General Butler has for months enjoyed a popularity of which he must cooperate with other officers. It may have been found that he was peculiarly and by his very constitution unfitted for such a position. Apart from this general conjecture, it is certain that in this particular instance of the Wilmington Expedition he failed to do what was expected of him.

In the first place, it was expected that General Weitzel should command the expedition; the command was already assigned to him. But Butler took the command upon himself. In the second place, Butler was behind time in getting prepared. As early as January 9, Grant wrote to Butler that Bragg had taken most of the forces defending Wilmington to Georgia to oppose Sherman.

Again, on December 4, Grant wrote: "I feel great anxiety to see the Wilmington expedition off, both on account of present fine weather, which we can expect no continuance of, and because Sherman may now be expected to strike the seacoast any day." Bragg has few to return. I think it advisable for you to notify Admiral Porter, and get off without delay, with or without your powder-boat. A week later Grant wrote again, urging haste. "If you do not get immediately you will lose the chance of surprising a weak garrison." Again, on the 16th: "What is the prospect for getting your expedition started? It is a great pity we were not ten or twelve days earlier. I am confident it would have been successful."

But Butler seems to have been obtuse about the powder-ship. It is almost ludicrous to what extent the leaders of the expedition built up their hope of success on a mere experiment. Butler delayed so long that another delay necessarily followed upon a change in the weather.

General Grant plainly intended that the troops, which numbered 6500, should remain on shore after landing, even if they could not successfully assault the fort. The rebels evidently feared that this policy would be adopted. But Butler seems to have misapprehended Grant's instructions. He says in his report that these did not contemplate a siege. But why take interesting tools if not for the purpose of laying siege to the fort? Certainly there is enough in the conduct of this expedition, as seen in the light of the above documents, to justify General Butler's removal from command. The point on which Butler takes his farewell order to his troops is one very unjust to General Grant. He tries to make it appear that he was removed because he was not willing to risk the lives of his men in a useless assault. This is not fair, and it is not calculated to impress men favorably with General Butler himself.

General Grant, after Butler's failure, organized the military division under the command of General Terry, which, in co-operation with Porter's fleet, has taken the fort. The attack this time proceeded under more favorable auspices. The land force was larger, and no warning was given to the rebels by weeks of delay. After the landing of the expedition a careful reconnoissance was made, and it was decided to risk an assault, which was made at 3.30 P.M. on the 15th. After 2 hours' severe fighting the fort was captured, with over a thousand prisoners and from 40 to 70 guns. Our loss is stated at 500.

The following letter is dated pages 56 and 57 relate to the previous action against Fort Fisher, but they will also convey to the reader an adequate idea of the main features of the situation in this second attack.

THE HOWLETT HOUSE BATTERY.

The Howlett House Battery is situated on the south bank of the James River, commands the extreme left of the rebel works covering the approaches to Petersburg. This battery commanded the bend of the river, where a canal is dug, which an attempt has been made to cut off by the Dutch Gap Canal. The river at this point was obstructed, and not blockaded, as according, had to construct these obstructions and the fire from the Howlett House Battery at the same time. If the canal should prove a success, then the army of the rear will cross under this battery sealess. Others, however, have been constructed higher up, and commanding the advance by way of the Gap.

PETROLEUM.

The New York and Liverpool Petroleum Company, whose advertisement appears elsewhere, offers unrivalled inducements to the public in connection agement in the fact that it is so largely owned and conducted by real men of oil—not mere speculators in corporations. Mr. Roger, one of its trustees, belongs to the Titusville firm of Brewer, Watson, & Co., whose wealth counts by millions. Mr. Myers, another, is an extensive refiner, operator and oilshipper; and others of them, so to speak, "live and move and have their being" in oil. Such features show that a company is real, and meant for permanence.

"THE PEN IS MIGHTIER THAN THE SWORD."

THE GOLD PEN—THE BEST OF ALL PENS,

MORTON'S GOLD PENS,

THE BEST PENS IN THE WORLD.

On receipt of any of the following sums in Cash, the Subscriber will send by return mail, or otherwise, as directed, a Gold Pen or Pens—selecting the same according to description, viz.:

THE GOLD PENS WITHOUT CASES.

For 50 cents, the Magic Pen; for 75 cents, the Lucky Pen; for $1 00, the Always-Ready Pen; for $1 25, the Excelsior Pen; and for $1 50, the Excelsior Pen.—These Pens are not numbered, but correspond in sizes to Numbers 1, 3, 4, 5, and 6, of the following.

THE SAME PENS IN SILVER-PLATED EXTENSION CASES.

For $1 00, the Magic Pen; for $1 25, the Lucky Pen; for $1 50, the Always-Ready Pen; for $2 00, the Excelsior Pen; and for $2 25, the Excelsior Pen.

These are Well-Finished, Gold-Working Gold Pens, with Iridomin Points, the average wear of every one of which will far outlast a gross of the best Steel Pens; although they are unwarranted, and, therefore, not exchangeable.

MORTON'S UNBRASTED PENS.

The names, "A. Morton," "Manufacturer," and "Quality," are stamped on the following Pens, and the points are warranted for six months, except against accident.

The Numbers indicate size only; No. 1 being the smallest, No. 10 the largest Mammoth Gold Pen, for the desk.

Long and Medium Nibs of all sizes and qualities. Short Nibs of No. 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10, made only of first quality.

The Long and Short Nibs are fine pointed: the Medium Nibs are Broad, Coarse Business Points. The engravings are fac-similes of the sizes and styles.

THE GOLD PENS WITHOUT CASES.

For $1 25 a No. 1 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 8 Pen, 2d quality.

For $1 50 a No. 3 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 8 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 9 Pen, 3d quality.

For $2 00 a No. 3 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 4 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 5 Pen, 3d quality.

For $2 25 a No. 4 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 6 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 7 Pen, 3d quality.

For $2 75 a No. 5 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 6 Pen, 2d quality.

For $3 50 a No. 6 Pen; $4 50 a No. 7 Pen; $5 75 a No. 8 Pen; $7 50 a No. 9 Pen; $7 50 a No. 10 Pen—all 1st quality.

THE SAME GOLD PENS, IN SILVER EXTENSION GOLD PENS, ALL OF 1ST QUALITY.

For $2 00 a No. 1 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 3 Pen, 2d quality.

For $2 50 a No. 3 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 8 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 9 Pen, 3d quality.

For $3 00 a No. 3 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 4 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 5 Pen, 3d quality.

For $3 75 a No. 4 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 5 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 6 Pen, 3d quality.

For $4 50 a No. 5 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 6 Pen, 2d quality.

For $5 75 a No. 6 Pen, 1st quality.

GOLD PENS, ALL OF 1ST QUALITY, IN SILVER-MOUNTED DESK-HOLDERS.

For $3 75 a No. 4 Pen; for $5 25 a No. 5 Pen; for $6 00 a No. 6 Pen; for $7 50 a No. 7 Pen.

For $7 a No. 8 Pen; for $8 a No. 9 Pen; and for $9 a No. 10 Pen.

The "1st Quality" are pointed with the very best Iridomin Points that can be procured, and some of these Quality are sold with the slightest imperfection which skill and the closest scrutiny can detect.

The "2d Quality" are superior to any Pens made by him previous to the Gold Pens.

The "3d Quality" he intends shall equal in respect to Durability, Elasticity, and Good Writing Qualities (the only true considerations) any Gold Pens made elsewhere.

The Pens with Cheap Cases, he hopes to be as any that previous to operating his New and Patented Machines, he could not have made Good Writing and Durable Gold Pens, for the Price, had the Gold been furnished gratuitously.

Parties ordering must in all instances specify the "Name" or the "Number" and "Quality" of the Pens wanted, and be particular to describe the kind they prefer: whether for fine, coarse or fine

All remittances sent by mail in registered letters are at my risk. Pens may be sent by twenty cents' postage, if registering, in addition to the price of goods ordered, I will guarantee their safe delivery.

Parties sending Gold or Silver will be allowed the full premium for the same in exchange.

TO CLUBS.—A discount of 10 per cent. will be allowed on one dozen Pens of the same kind, and of 20 per cent. on $40, if sent to one address at one time.

CONSTITUTION AND LIFE SYRUP,
COMPOSED OF
IODIDE POTASSIUM,
WITH THE COMPOUND CONCENTRATED FLUID EXTRACT OF VALUABLE MEDICINAL ROOTS AND HERBS

PREPARED BY
WILLIAM H. GREGG, M.D.,
Graduate of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York, formerly Assistant Physician to the Blackwell's Island Hospitals, late Medical Inspector of the New York State Volunteer Depots, under Governor Edwin D. Morgan.

Constitution Life Syrup
HAS PRODUCED A REVOLUTION IN MEDICINE

What may seem almost incredible is that many diseases hitherto considered incurable in any form are frequently cured in a few days or weeks; and we cheerfully invite the investigations of the liberal-minded and scientific, as cures which have no parallel at the present day.

During the past few years we have been contended with obstacles, and overcome opposition, as herculean as ever ever encountered by any remedy.

RAPIDITY OF CURE.

Some say, "Your cures are too quick," while others doubt their genuineness, and think that a disease can only be cured by the "slow, recuperative process of Nature."

This is our reply: If a patient is sick, and has a well-balanced scale, is in a state of Equilibrium. But when, from any cause, down goes one side of the scale, we have the effects of disease. What is requisite is to restore the normal balance of the scale.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Is a positive and specific remedy for all diseases originating from an IMPURE STATE OF THE BLOOD, and for all HEREDITARY DISEASES DERIVED FROM A FAMILY TAINT.

PARALYSIS.

It is so universally admitted that CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP is the only effective means of relief in the various forms of Paralysis, that we need not reiterate that fact in emphatically the Great Life-giving Power.

DYSPEPSIA.

INDIGESTION, WEIGHT AT STOMACH, FLATULENCE, LIVER COMPLAINT, ACIDITY, AND ALL DISEASES OF THE DIGESTIVE CONSTIPATION, BILIOUSNESS.

SCROFULA,

STUBBORN, KING'S EVIL, ULCERATED SWELLINGS, ERYSIPELAS, ULCERATION, SALT RHEUM.

This taint communicated and aggravated, filling life with untold misery, is, by all usual medical remedies, incurable.

RHEUMATISM.

LARYNGITIS, LUMBAGO, NEURALGIA, SCIATICA, GOUT, TIC DOLOUREUX.

If there is any disease in which the CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP is a specific, it is Rheumatism in all its hideous affections. The most intense pains are almost instantly alleviated—sometimes entirely relieved. In Gases, chronic or vicarious, of twenty or thirty years' standing, have been cured by us.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Purges the system entirely from all the evil effects of MERCURY, removing the Bad Breath, and curing the WORST SORES and Rheumatic Pains when the use of Calomel is sure to produce. It hardens Spongy Gums, and secures the Teeth as firmly as ever.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Eradicates, root and branch, all Eruptive Diseases of the Skin, like

ULCERS, PIMPLES, BLOTCHES,

And all other effects of this Taint. It leaves no such disfigure the outward appearance of both males and females, often making them a disgusting object to themselves and their friends.

For all Forms of Ulcerative Diseases,

Either of the Nose, Throat, Tongue, Spine, Forehead, or Scalp, no remedy has ever been found like it.

Moth Patches upon the female face, depending upon a diseased action of the liver, will be entirely cured by the young wife and mother. A few bottles of CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP will restore the complexion, and remove the deposit, which is directly under the skin.

Diseases of the Larynx, giving rise to Languor, Dizziness, Indigestion, Weak Stomach, or an ulcerated or cancerous condition of that organ, however much

A NOVEL.
By the Author of "Owen: A Waif," &c.
8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

OPINIONS OF THE ENGLISH PRESS.

Saturday Review.

A healthier novel we have not seen for many a season. To have depicted such a character as Mattie Grey, and to have depicted it successfully, is an slight achievement either ethical or æsthetical.

Athenæum.

"Mattie: a Stray," is a novel that ought to take a higher rank than that of an ephemeral work of fiction. Mattie is a charming heroine. She and her life are painted after the life. The story is full of interest at every page.

Spectator.

There is great ability in this book.

Sun.

A very attractive, interesting, and naturally-told tale. It well sustains the author's high reputation.

Banner.

An admirable Novel. It is a picture of life so true and vivid as to rivet the attention from first to last.

John Bull.

The story of "Mattie: a Stray," is fully worthy of the author's high reputation. The interest is well sustained throughout, and the descriptive passages are given with unusual power. It bids fair to be one of the most popular novels of the season.

THE CAPTURE OF FORT FISHER.

AFTER the failure of the first attempt against Fort Fisher in December, the fleet returned to Beaufort to await further orders from the President and Secretary of the Navy. Admiral PORTER still remained confident that a persistent effort to capture the fort would succeed. The reports obtained from prisoners indicated that in case an assault had been ventured by General BUTLER it would have been crowned with success. How far Lieutenant-General GRANT coincided with this opinion we do not know. But he was so far dissatisfied with BUTLER'S conduct of the expedition that at his suggestion that officer was removed. General GRANT certainly believed that if the fort could not be taken by assault, there were other means which would insure its capture. It was unlike him to give the expedition up after having once undertaken it. And what was of still greater importance, Wilmington must be taken in order to secure for General SHERMAN a convenient water base in North Carolina for co-operation with the armies about Richmond. General GRANT'S plan for the next campaign is a comprehensive one, and the capture of Fort Fisher was an essential preliminary upon which many minor details of that campaign depend. In one way or another the capture must be accomplished, and the sooner the better.

It was taken for granted by the rebels that the attempt would not be repeated—at least not in connection with a land-force. HOKE'S rebel division was therefore withdrawn from Federal Point. This conviction of security was doubtless increased by the opinion publicly expressed by General WEITZEL that the rebel work was impregnable by assault. The result also of the first bombardment, though it was pronounced terrific, was not such as to give a merely naval attack any hope of success.

In the mean time the military division of the expedition was considerably reinforced. General BUTLER'S force had numbered 6500. To these another brigade was added, and to General TERRY was given the command of the division.

Orders to move from Beaufort were received January 11. No warning was given to the enemy by delay, and the weather favored a prompt movement. The fleet arrived off Federal Point on the morning of the 13th, and the troops were landed with twelve days' provisions in the afternoon. The naval engagement commenced at 7.30 A.M. Admiral PORTER sent in the New Ironsides, in whose lead followed four Monitors—the Saugus, Canonicus, Monadnock, and Mahopac. These came within a thousand yards of the fort, and drew its fire in order to ascertain the position of its guns as a guide to their own fire. This bombardment began to tell soon upon the southern angle of Fort Fisher. The traverses began to disappear, and one after another the guns were silenced. "By way of letting the enemy know that we did not intend to take any unfair advantage of him by using the iron vessels alone," PORTER ordered the wooden ships, led by the Brooklyn, to advance to the attack. These performed their part "in the handsomest manner; not a mistake was committed except firing too rapidly and making too much smoke." At night the wooden vessels retired, and the iron-clads fired irregularly all night. A good portion of the troops were landed, and were within a mile and a half of the fort, occupying a line along the entire width of the peninsula. A 15-inch gun burst during the day on the Mahopac, wounding three persons, two of whom were officers.

On the 14th, Saturday, the bombardment was renewed and kept up till sunset, when, says Admiral PORTER, "the fort was reduced to a pulp." During the day a careful reconoissance was made by General TERRY, who determined to risk an assault on the following day.

On the 15th, arrangements having been made between the naval and military commanders for the proposed assault, all the vessels of the fleet united in a heavy fire, which was kept up until 3 o'clock P.M. This was the time fixed upon for the assault. TERRY had placed PAINE'S Division of colored soldiers along the line facing Wilmington, while ABBOT'S Division, supported by fourteen hundred marines, advanced to the assault. The naval brigade was under the command of Commander K. R. BREESE. Lieutenant CUSHING was one of the company commanders. This column advanced against the seaward front of the fort on the left. During the past hour or two the bombardment had been unusually terrific, the sailors in the mean while having laid down behind partial breast-works. But the moment the fleet ceased firing and the marines rose to their feet the garrison of the fort, numbering over two thousand, appeared on the parapet. This was evidently thought by the rebels to be the main column of the assault, and the whole available force of the fort was turned against them. Before this fire the troops began at length to waver. The men fell thick and fast, some of them being rolled by the surf into the water. Here the brave Lieutenants PRESTON and PORTER fell. This column was repulsed amidst the cheers of the rebel garrison. This repulse was owing to a lack of organization among the marines. It was intended that the party boarding the parapet should be covered by marines and sharp-shooters in the trenches which had been dug within 200 yards of the fort. No such support was given, and the assault failed.

In the mean time ABBOT'S Division had already approached the western side of the fort. The garrison had been aware of their presence in the woods, but supposed that they were intended to reinforce the naval column. The movement which was really made had the effect of a surprise. The naval brigade had only been in action a few minutes when ABBOT'S column, from the Cape Fear River side, entered the fort at the west end through the sally-port. The abbatis was scaled, and the flags of the One Hundred and Seventeenth New York and the Thirteenth Indiana, of General CURTIS'S Brigade, were quickly planted on the fifth and sixth traverses of the fort. Behind the sixth traverse the enemy made a stand, but a bold bayonet charge drove them to the seventh. The top of the eighth had been gained when the assailants were driven back into the seventh, where the fighting lasted over an hour, when, at a given signal, PORTER aided the troops by bombarding the eastern portion of the fort. It was a smooth sea, and such accuracy was obtained in the firing from the fleet that only two or three shells fell among our own force, while they produced considerable effect on the enemy.

"These traverses," says Admiral PORTER, "are immense bomb-proofs, about sixty feet long, fifty feet wide, and twenty feet high—secure from shot in all—being on the northeast face. Between each traverse or bomb-proof are one or two heavy guns. The fighting lasted until ten o'clock at night, the Ironsides and Monitors firing through the traverses in advance of our troops, and the level strip of land called Federal Point being enfiladed by the ships to prevent reinforcements reaching the rebels."

At the o'clock one half the fort was in our possession. Our position was maintained until the arrival of reinforcements, when another charge was made at nine o'clock. This drove the garrison toward the end of the Point, making here and there a stand at the water-batteries, until they were pushed to the extremity, when they surrendered. At that time Gen. General WHITING and Colonel LAMB, who conducted the defense of the fort, were lying wounded in one of the bomb-proofs of the water-batteries. Our losses had been great—how great it is impossible now to say with accuracy. It has been estimated at 800, but this includes the naval loss also, as well as the casualties from the explosion of the magazine the next morning. The naval brigade lost one hundred and seventy men. In the military division every one of the three commanders of the brigades engaged in the assault—CURTIS, PENNYPACKER, and BELL—were wounded. The last of these has died.

The scene which followed upon the surrender was brilliant beyond description. The heavy chest from the captured fort was echoed from the entire fleet. From every vessel rockets were thrown up into the air, filling the sky with brightness. Every one had escaped from the fort to tell the tale of disaster. Nineteen hundred prisoners were taken, and seventy-six guns. The fort had been manned with 2300 men, 400 of whom were killed or wounded.

The next morning after the capture of the fort a terrible accident occurred, which somewhat marred the cheer of victory. By some most culpable negligence the fuses were allowed to communicate with magazine of the fort with lighted candles. This occasioned an explosion at 8 o'clock A.M., which resulted in a loss of about 200 men. This was chiefly upon three regiments—the One Hundred and Sixty-ninth and One Hundred and Fifteenth New York, and Fourth New Hampshire. Colonel ALONZO ALDEN, of the One Hundred and Sixty-ninth, had both his legs broken, and is reported dead.

Later advices from Admiral PORTER confirm the report that Fort Caswell, on Oak Island, had been blown up by the enemy. The work commanded the Old Inlet, was built of granite, and mounted a large number of guns. The rebel steamers Fulton and Beauregard had also been blown up. Admiral PORTER states his loss at 21 officers killed and wounded, and 309 men.

In his report the Admiral says: "I have since visited Fort Fisher and its adjoining works, and find their strength greatly beyond what I had conceived. An engineer might be excusable in saying they could not be captured except by regular siege. I cannot see how it was done, except in the way, as I said before, is really stronger than the Malakoff Tower, which defied so long the combined power of France and England; and yet it is captured by a handful of men, under the fire of the guns of the fleet, and in seven hours after the attack commenced in earnest."

General TERRY has added another to his well-won laurels by the success of his assault on Fort Fisher. At the capture of Fort Pulaski, at the battle of Pocotaligo, in the operations which led to the capture of Morris Island and Fort Wagner, and in the tedious campaign of last summer upon the James, he has taken a distinguished part. And now the country rejoices over his last and most brilliant achievement at Fort Fisher. Although not a graduate of West Point, he was in youth a military student, and now at the war with as much practical knowledge of the art of war as his peers from West Point. He is about six feet and two inches high, slender, with bright hair and blue eyes, and a grave but gentle expression of countenance. As modest as he is brave, he well merits Admiral PORTER'S enthusiastic praise as "the brave-ideal soldier and a general." Connecticut has given to the war LION, SEDGWICK, MANSFIELD, FOOTE, and WINTHROP. Not a none may she be more justly proud than of the hero of Fort Fisher.

FREE MISSOURI.

BEHOLD, along the rugged battle-ways,
Freedom with yet another trophy comes;
Comes joyously, 'mid blare of throbbing drums,
And trumpets pealing jocund notes of praise.

Missouri's free! No more shall lash and chain
Her symbols be the sisterhood among;
No more the shadow of her shame be flung
Along the North-tides hurrying to the main.

No more shall Ruin bar the poor man's gate,
Or wasted fields in ghastly silence lie;
No more shall murdered souls for vengeance cry,
Or bondmen for the purple morning wait.

No more! Already on each drowsy height,
And through the age-locked, rusted prison-doors,
That promised dawn its golden splendor pours,
Expelling all the shadows of the night!

Missouri's free! God bless her hair of gold—
Last, fairest daughter of dear Freedom's flock—
And set off fleet as last upon the flock
The Fathers found in the brave days of old!

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1865.

MORE "BLESSINGS IN DISGUISE" AT HAND.

A S General SHERMAN enters upon his new campaign the enemy in the region toward which he will probably advance begins the work of burning all in Georgia. When he moved out of Atlanta he was saluted in two hostile keys, one of rage, the other of ridicule. The horrible things that he was meant to do, the hopeless slavery to which the people were to be subjected, the desolation which was to blight the country, these were made the spurs to frantic appeals to arm all to him, to hunt him down, and destroy the savage and his hosts. On the other hand, he was a cornered fox obliged to run into a trap. The boastfulness of his underrating also showed his desperate condition. His march was an ignominious retreat which must end in his destruction, etc., etc.

Somehow he arrived comfortably and sat down in Savannah after an agreeable journey. He came neither like ALARIC nor TIMOUR THE TARTAR, but as the benign supporter and servant of an equal and benign Government, against which those who were anxious that others should "hunt" him had ceaselessly rebelled. There was never a time in the history of this unhappy so hostile a country that devastated so little and was so little molested. After resting at Savannah the invincible General now turns his face northward, and the cry that greeted him before again breaks forth.

Here is a specimen of the frenzied effort to excite the South Carolinian against him. It is a letter written to a Charleston newspaper, from Pocotaligo, just before SHERMAN occupied it:

"SHERMAN and his thieves and robbers have sworn that South Carolina shall be made desolate. His commanders have spoken it to the wife of one of our generals—unblushingly left as Sunday's text. They have said it. And it has been reiterated from the mouth of every private brought into our lines. In truth, they say, it is to be left behind them unconsumed. Neither will respect be paid to youth, beauty, or age. 'Booty and beauty,' the original war-cry with which South Carolina was threatened, is to be re-echoed upon her soil. Unless our people have submitted themselves to be Yankee tradesmen and slaves, these fiends incarnate will be driven howling from their borders. Let every man do his duty during the conflict. Let the march of the enemy upon our own soil be rendered perilous by the crack of the unerring rifle and the whistle of every leaden bullet. Obstruct his path in his pathway; and let our women, instead of exhibiting timidity, nervousness, and panic, bring themselves under the representatives of those of '76. The true of liberty must be watered by the blood of tyrants, or else the field has and gentle but fearless soul of woman must nurture and strengthen it."

We had all this two months ago in Georgia, and what do we now see? We see that this kind of talk is not believed by those whom it is intended to affect. When SHERMAN marched from Atlanta the people were not summoned or stirred to take shot-guns and assemble for "a grand hunt." They did not come. Now that he moves from Savannah, the Carolinians are exhorted to do the same thing. But they will not come. The soldiers will fight, but the people will not destroy their stores or desolate their plantations. Georgia found in that single opportunity for the last ditch, and it was not accepted. Savannah surrendered. Why? Because the people disbelieved just such rhetoric as we have quoted, and which SHERMAN'S men stoned the people of the Confederate States, each State acting in its sovereign and independent character, in order to form a permanent federal government," etc., etc., "do ordain and establish this Constitution for the Confederate States of America."

Here the rebels say exactly what they mean, and what the people of the United States, who made the Constitution, neither meant nor said. This instrument is the bond of a league of sovereign States, or federation. Ours is the act of people residing in several States creating a nation. Now war justifies itself, in the rebel mind, upon the ground that the Union is not a nation, but a federation; and the deplorably confused condition of public sentiment at the time the secession movement began was greatly owing to the loose way in which this nation had been called a federation or a confederacy. If it were only that, there might be some question as to the power of the Federal or Confederate Government. If it had, on the other hand, always been our care to speak of ourselves as a nation, and we had properly regarded the powers of the Government as national and supreme, we should have escaped much of that panic of wonder and hesitation during which the national Government might easily have been overthrown.

The difference between nation and confederacy is vital. If we had been a federation, undoubtedly Mr. PENDLETON and his peace party are correct in saying that it is neither lawful nor desirable to resist secession by force. In that case, also, the word federal properly describes the Government, and therefore it is used by the rebel organ in the city of New York, and by all our foreign readers. But why should journalists who are fighting for the nation against a Confederacy to be created from a part of the fragments of the nation, and orators who are pleading for it, and editors who are writing for it, persist in using a word which merely expresses the rebel theory of our Government, and is in itself a partial validation of their conduct? If we are not a confederated group of States but a nation, a rebellion against the Government must either overthrow it or be utterly overthrown. Since we mean nation, let us say nation.

THE SOLDIERS' REST.

EVERY traveler by the New York and New Haven Railroad has had occasion to observe the vast extent of a Soldiers' Rest, or comfortable quarters for the soldiers constantly going and coming by that route, where they can have a pleasant shelter and simple refreshment. Especially now when the railroads seem to be pretty much worn out, and when the connections are seldom made, there are many soldiers daily arriving from the East and going to Washington, who frequently find themselves with four or five hours on their hands; or coming from Washington, homeward bound, ill perhaps, or wounded, or weak in early convalescence—and for all these there is no kind of adequate provision. The New England rooms are devoted to other purposes, and there are other institutions which serve other ends.

The subject has enlisted the sympathy of many who always bear the soldiers in mind, and two or three weeks since the project of founding such a Rest was discussed among several gentlemen, who instantly subscribed several hundreds of dollars; and GEORGE ELLIS, JUN., 45 William Street, temporarily took charge of the subscriptions and publicly invited more. He has engaged the only suitable place near the station of the New Haven Road; and it is hoped that, by the time this notice is printed, a responsible committee will assume the care of the whole subject.

Meanwhile, as we understand subscriptions may be sent to Mr. BLISS.

"The army and navy forever,
And three cheers for the red, white, and blue."

FROM AN ENGLISH FRIEND OF AMERICA.

ONE of the most intelligent and serviceable, and conspicuous of our friends in England, who has yet doubted whether our Government could re-establish itself without sacrifice of its intrinsic character, writes upon hearing of SHERMAN'S progress and of THOMAS'S victory:

"I am beginning to believe in what until very lately, though I always wished it, I have doubted—the feasibility of restoring the Union Government over the length and breadth of its former dominions—of rescuing it, I mean, without danger to constitutional government and free institutions. The resources which Democracy has developed, both for military enterprise and civil administration—the wonderful facility of adaptability to circumstances, a power even more wonderful, I think, than its tenacity of purpose and thorough-going devotion to any end once fairly resolved on—all this has, I confess, altogether transcended any thing which I had thought of, and makes me feel how entirely wanting in a true conception of the elements of the case my speculations have been.

"Let me say, however, that never was speculator better pleased at seeing his anticipations realized than I am to hail the disappointment of mine. I think I may even say that every step toward this consummation has been for me an occasion of personal satisfaction.

"I am sure that I need not tell you that I was exceedingly pleased with those little speeches of the President which you sent me. [Those to the serenaders just after the election.] They contain the infallible indications of a great mind. In my enthusiasm for the President I do not think I should yield even to the most ardent member of the Union League.

"I have just been reading GOLDWIN SMITH'S reply to the invitation addressed to the Union League. It seems to me exceedingly good; in the tone (and this is equally the case with all his manifestations in the United States that I have seen) I think he has hit the very point that was to be desired. I sincerely trust his visit may conduce to that which is the highest object of the best friends of countries—a more charitable mutual appreciation.

"The Canadian difficulty for the moment is a cloud on the horizon, but I can not believe that it threatens any thing serious. Judge DAY'SAL'S proceedings are flagrantly in error, and are very possibly dictated by corrupt bias; but the Canadian Government is in very good disposition to apply a drastic remedy, and Mr. LINCOLN had always expressed his confidence in their good faith."

This is the spirit of a true patriotism, free from envy, and full of generous appreciation of other nations, and of the great fact, which becomes more and more clear to every observer, ship, that it is the true interest of nations to be mutually respecting friends and not defiant rivals and foes.

MRS. HUTCHINS.

IN commenting some weeks since upon the pardon of Mrs. HUTCHINS—a woman of Baltimore who gave a sword or flag to the rebel raider GILMORE—we suggested that it would be satisfactory to know upon what grounds she was pardoned.

Since our article was published we learn that the oath has been made public to which Mrs. HUTCHINS freely and fully subscribed—an oath of such a character that she must be a very bad woman who could take it meaning to perjure herself. It is also understood that she will only an expression of the sympathy in which she has been educated, and that five years in a common jail was a rather severe punishment for merely wishing well to the rebels.

If that were the extent of her offense we are fully agreed that it was a very severe penalty, and that it is under the circumstances properly remitted. But how happened she to be so heavily sentenced for such a misdemeanor?

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE SITUATION.

The political news of the week is unimportant. The bill for the relief of the Missouri Radical Convention Committee is still before the Senate. The Amendatory Loan Bill was passed by the House on the 26th. The Senate 154 a bill passed the House reducing the duty on imported printing paper to 3 per cent. ad valorem. It is to be hoped that this bill will soon pass the Senate.

On our first page we give a detailed account of the capture of Fort Fisher, of which we have engraved several illustrations. In addition to the details there stated all the remaining fortifications near the mouth of Cape Fear River were come into the possession of the Union, increasing the number of guns captured to 162. The loss in the military division was 119 killed and 536 wounded. Admiral and General Sherman resumed operations January 14. The fifteenth and seventeenth Corps, under Gen. Ord, were sent to Beaufort, and from that point moved out to Pocotaligo, on the Charleston and Savannah Railroad. This place was evacuated by the enemy, and our army was found encamped within 20 miles of Branchville and 60 miles of Charleston.

CONGRESS.

January 18:

In the Senate, there was a long debate on the case of General Payne, which had no practical result. A bill was reported from the Military Committee providing for the exercise of retaliation upon rebel prisoners for cruelties inflicted upon our own. In the House, a resolution was passed ratifying the action given by the President to Great Britain of the termination of the treaty of 1817 limiting the naval force on the lakes.

In the House, a resolution of inquest was adopted relative to prisoners now confined in the Old Capitol and Carlisle prisons.

January 19:

In the Senate, resolutions of thanks to General Terry and Admiral Porter were passed. A bill was passed, amending the act defining the pay of army officers so that the lowest rank shall not entitle the holder to any increase of pay.

In the House, the Legislative Appropriation bill came up. An amendment was passed appropriating in addition to the $2,000,000 already appropriated, $1,000,000 for clothing, gas, stamps, paper, printing, and circulating Treasury notes.

January 20:

The Senate was not in session.

In the House, the Senate's amendments to the Consular and Diplomatic Appropriation bill were concurred in. One of these provides for a Minister Extraordinary to the Republic of Mexico. The Judiciary Committee reported bills holding the United States Circuit and District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia, and the District of Florida, six passed. The Amendatory Loan bill came up. The bill provides for no additional loan, but only changes the form of one already authorized from five-twenties to seven-thirties. It also authorizes the issue of notes not restricting the issue of legal tenders. The Post-office Appropriation bill was passed. The Secretary of the Navy communicated the following facts relative to the bursting of Parrott guns at Charleston: "Guns were not destroyed on board the Ticonderoga, Juniata, Mackinaw, Quaker City, and Canandaigua. Forty-five persons were killed and wounded. The cause of the explosion was not fully ascertained.

January 23:

In the Senate, a communication was received from the Secretary of War, showing that the number of credits given for naval enlistments from April 17, 1861, to February 24, 1864, was 67,087. The principle was to credit three men to every three calls.

In the House, a joint resolution was passed by a vote of 112 to 46, that in lieu of the duty on paper, there be raised and used for books and newspapers, now levied by law, there shall be levied a three per cent. duty, ad valorem, on the value of paper of foreign into the country. MR. FIELD, of Louisiana, who had assaulted Mr. Kelley, of Pennsylvania, for language used in debate, was passed, with an amendment suspending Mr. Field from any privileges which the House had hitherto extended him until the report of the Committee should be heard.

January 24:

In the Senate, the resolution relative to retaliation upon rebel prisoners for the sufferings experienced by our prisoners at the hands of the rebels was debated at length.

In the House, a joint resolution of the session was taken up in the consideration of Mr. Brooks's charges against General Butler. Mr. Brooks presented documents completely relieving Butler from the charge of gold-robbery. The Committee reported that the General Butler's communications in the matter had been above-board, and were well known to the Government.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ALTHOUGH at our latest foreign advices the news of the capture of Fort Fisher and the fall of Wilmington and Smithville had just reached England, the rebel loan had already been largely subscribed for. The amount had been ten per cent, having fallen from 63 to 52. The news of Fort Fisher's fall, however, has produced a reaction, and indeed the apprehension which that order had occasioned.

The Swedish war steamer Gauchere was lost in the Arctic seas in November. Only nine of her crew, including the commander, were saved. The remainder, 99 in number, were drowned.

The Paris Bourse has been very active, and the rentes, 4½,125,375 sterling—a decrease of only £636,000 as compared with 1864, notwithstanding a reduction of several millions in the import duties of the country during the last year.

At the New Year's reception of the Diplomatic Corps by the Emperor Napoleon the latter, in reply to the felicitations of the Nuncio Bonnetti, expressed his trust that events would continue to reign between them, and said that his relations with the Holy See would be ever supported by respect for right and love of peace and justice. M. Mon has received a thousand dollars from the hands of the Emperor said to him that no one could contribute better than he to the work of pacification and the intimate relations between France and Spain, to which the Emperor attached much importance. Napoleon also spoke in terms of confidence of the situation in regard to all matters of Church as well as of State. It is said that the French Minister of Public Justice addressed a circular to the Bishops, announcing that the Government has decided to put a stop to the expediency of authorizing the publication of that part of the Papal Encyclical which relates to Liberty. THE CHILDHOOD OF JAMES WATT.—Watt was, from his birth, of an extremely delicate constitution, suffered for taking part in the common sports of boys, and I take pained for those struggles with difficulties which afterward marked his career. His mother, who was a woman below remarkable for her intelligence than for her personal graces, taught him to read when scarcely out of his babyhood, and his father, who was a shrewd, upstart and dealer in naval stores in Greenock, added a thirst for knowledge to his inheritance. In the child's rapidity improved, and he was fond of working out his sums with a pointed piece of charcoal on the hearthstone, and on a piece of chalk upon the floor—sometimes his only succedaneum—when he was sent to bed. Another of his favorite subject compelled his parents to keep him at home. On one occasion when he was basking on a warm hearth, with the usual piece of chalk, a visitor who was present remarked that the child's head ought to be full of mathematics, and his father permitted to lide away his time in that way. "Not at all," said the father, "he is only making a fool of himself." "Mother," said the boy, "what is a fool?" This question was the source a problem to the mother, which was never solved by his aunt Muirhead, while talking to her sister Watts, for the child's mental infirmity, with the worthy lady, solemnly, "I never saw such an idle boy as you are. Tury take a look and employ yourself usefully;" for the last hour you have not spoken one word, but you have sat there with your two arms and your eyes, holding now a cup and now a spoon over the steam, watching how it rises from the spout, collecting and counting the drops as they falls into. Are you not ashamed of spending your time in that way?" The little fellow gave her a look, as his mother observes M. Arago, who tells the story, became the mighty magician, conquering the discoveries which were to immortalize him.

THE CHARLIE LAUGHTON OF FAIR PALAU.—In a shipyard the other day, a tar from a man-of-war observed a sailor making boys dodge and dive by throwing a seven-foot cross-cut saw through a huge oak log. "Why, you are a dab, Jim, at that game. Can you play at any other, sea-say, sea-saw, pick; push; push, pull, Jack studding-sail?" Jim answered, with a knowing look, that he could do what they were pulling to see who could get the most out of him in the minimum time. Jim and the other sailor, his fellow, he decided to see fair play; so, giving the big one a blow that sent him over the gunwale, Jim picked the saw out of the log, and giving it to the small one, said, "Now you have your turn, Jack."

SWISS PASSENGER CARS.—In Switzerland nothing can be more convenient than the passenger cars. Each has the traveler quite access by ascending a few steps, leading to a platform, protected by railing for passengers. A door opens into the interior, fitted up like a saloon, with a table in the middle, and seats on each side. Communication is kept by means of a window in the door, and by a speaking tube. Each compartment contains seats for eight persons. The seats are made so as to face opposite points of the carriage, thereby giving a stranger the most comfortable plan, with the only exception that the traveler must sit with his back to his alone—a position very comfortable, which, as we but too well know, is fraught with danger.

THE CAVE OF ADELSBERG.—Each journal publishes the following strange history of an old Gothic arm-chair, which, for the last few days since it has been exhibited, rooms in the Rue Drouot. The article in question, at first sight, appears a very common one, and is known as the Voltaire, and figured in her boudoir. After the death of Madame Du Barry, it was sent, by the unfortunate lady's her desire, to Queen Marie Antoinette of France, and was subsequently sent to the Temple, and by the Commissioners in the Temple. After the King's tragical death, Clary, Queen of Sweden, became its possessor, and took it to England, where it successively became the property of the Duke of Wellington and the Duke of Aumale, its present owner. The latter took it with him to Berlin, and there sent it to the Exhibition of Vienna. The reason to which it was introduced found in the stuffing of the seat a diamond pin, and on the back of a box, in which it was sent, a small written manuscript. The man sold the pin, and gave the article and the box to a watchmaker, in the neighborhood. Some years later the watchmaker, whose name was Naudin, was summoned to repair a clock set off at Lagny, and produced the paper and portrait in support of his protestations. The making some noise in France, and also in Belgium, where he lost his son, who called himself the Count de Hainaut, and was set off at Lagny, and also there. The workman who found the portrait and document, and kept his secret till long after the King's death, he revealed the whole to his family. One of his relatives, who was employed in the same work as he, and who had purchased it, and sold it to a French traveler, who carried it to Berlin. About 10,000 pieces of Roman money, principally of the time of Constantine, have been found at Lyons. They have just been discovered in the bed of the Mayenne, at St. Jean-sur-Mayenne, by the engineers who are at work on the dangerous ford having formerly existed at the spot, and which it is the intention to blow up in order to deepen the money ex aequo.

EFFECTS OF CHLOROFORM.—The last volume of "Transactions" issued by the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society contains a valuable report of the committee of the society appointed "to inquire into the uses and the physiological effects of chloroform, and other anæsthetic agents, as well as the best mode of administering it and of obviating the dangers attendant upon the exhibition of inhalation." The report is accompanied by many details exhibiting the results of the "very extensive series of physiological Conclusions" "Chloroform at first increases the force and frequency of the pulse, but soon slights and persistent. When complete anæsthesia is produced by chloroform, the pulse is found to be full, slow, and of average force. The strongest doses of chloroform vapor, when administered by a skilful person, rarely destroy life immediately by arresting the action of the heart. By moderate doses of chloroform the heart's action is more slowly arrested, and sometimes before death ceases; respiration generally, but not invariably, ceases before the action of the heart. The state of the blood to the failure of the heart's action and to that of the respiration, is found to be arterial in character. The use of chloroform increases with the degree of stupor it produces. The insensibility to pain is not always consistent. THE LATE LIEUTENANT SAMUEL W. PRESTON.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

THE LATE LIEUTENANT BENJAMIN H. PORTER.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

LIEUTENANT S. W. PRESTON.

LIEUTENANT SAMUEL W. PRESTON, killed in the attack on Fort Fisher, while acting as Flag-Lieutenant of the fleet of Admiral PORTER, was a native of Canada, but at an early age removed to Illinois, from which State he was appointed to the navy in 1838. He served as midshipman and ensign until August, 1852, when he was promoted Lieutenant. When Admiral DAHLGREN attacked Charleston for the first time with the fleet he was Flag-Lieutenant of the Wabash, and afterward he commanded the Ironsides. He also acted on DAHLGREN'S staff in the attack which was subsequently made on Fort Sumter. He was taken prisoner here and sent to Columbia, South Carolina, where he was imprisoned for fourteen months. Upon his exchange he was assigned to duty in the North Atlantic squadron. He was a young officer only 29 years old, and he fell leading a company of the Naval Brigade in the assault on Fort Fisher.

LIEUTENANT B. H. PORTER.

LIEUTENANT B. H. PORTER, killed in the assault on Fort Fisher, was born in New York in 1840, and entered the navy at the age of fourteen. In the Burnside Expedition he was midshipman in the frigate Roanoke; and during the battle of Roanoke Island he commanded the launch of six Dahlgren howitzers in the advance of the centre. He maintained his position under a galling fire until most of his men had fallen, when one of his guns exploded and only one man remained with him. At last this solitary gunner, a young man of seventeen, fell, and PORTER remained alone, cleaning, loading, and firing his guns himself until the day was won. He was promoted November 8, 1862. Afterward he was captured by the enemy, who kept him a prisoner during the greater part of a year. He had only been released a short time when he was assigned to PORTER'S squadron. He commanded the flag-ship Malvern, but was killed while leading a company in the assault on Fort Fisher.

LOVE AND FATE.

IT was my last evening of a month I had been spending with my friend Frank Blundell. We had met, after an interval of some years, in his country home. My friend had married since I last saw him, and his wife was a stranger to me until this visit. I found her one of the few wives who practically recommend marriage to their husbands' unmarried friends. This she did, in a great measure, by the sense of reliableness as a wife—I don't know how I can better describe it—which she conveyed. Her husband evidently had faith in her, in small matters as in great. It was plain that he trusted to her doing a thing as he would have to have it done, and that they had become one in the details of everyday experience as they were one in heart.

Assuredly here was a very pleasant face, with its setting of beautiful hair and its rare eyes—eyes which stand the test of a heightened color—becoming neither dull, nor uncertain, nor metallic, but only warmer toned, as Nature becomes in a summer sunset. As a hostess—a position affording such opportunities of making or marring the comfort of a guest—Mrs. Frank Blundell was eminently the "right woman in the right place."

Their cottage was delightfully placed, looking southward across a valley upon plantations of sweet chestnut, then but crimsoning. For it was the season, so enjoyable in the country, between the very outdoorishness of summer and the permanent adoption of fires. There was plenty of amusement—walks and drives in the charming neighborhood, and visits to the hop-gardens, where armies of hop-pickers, with their pockets the pole-gallows, were advancing, leaving desolation in their track: a scene which no artist has fairly pictured, but which every boy ought to see.

Well, as I have said, it was my last evening at the cottage. We were sitting together, Blundell and I, after dinner, when he said, "There's a fire in my room; I vote we go there till Mary is ready for tea."

So we went, and talked from our easy-chairs through a perfumed cloud. It soon became evident to me that my friend had "something on his mind."

"In all our talks together about old times since you have been here," he said, "we have never touched upon one topic. I suppose some delicacy of feeling—for I verily believe you have a little of it—has prevented your beginning the subject."

I was going to protest against this modified form of compliment, and to ask a question, when I was stopped by—

"Don't bother, that's a good fellow, or I shall never get to my story. You remember well enough, I have no doubt, how I used to talk of Mary Percival?"

"Yes," I said, "and I have often wondered what it all came to. The Christian name is a 'household word' here. Was it Mary—?" I was checked again by Blundell's look.

"You promised to listen," he growled, "and now you are cross-examining. Have a little patience, and forgive me. For I repeat what I have already told you. Mary Percival and I were friends from infancy. Our mothers were friends before us, and my earliest recollections are associated with her and hers. When we came to be man and woman we read and argued and were happy together, as we had played and quarrelled and 'made up' again in our childhood. The old friendship had increased, but not changed its character; at least I can speak for myself. You remember what Tennyson says in 'Dora'—

> 'The youth, because
> He had been always with her in the house,
> Thought not of Dora.'

It was something like this with me. Yet I admired Mary very much, and loved her, after a fashion, very dearly, and would have done or suffered almost any thing to give her pleasure or to spare her pain. You have heard all this before, but don't mean to inflict any more of it on you. Now take yourself back to college days and attempt, and to recall a time when Horner"—Blundell scowled as they called him."

"I remember him perfectly," I said. "A broad-shouldered man, with curly chestnut hair and white arms."

"He and I had a slight acquaintance at the college; and meeting in town after we took our degree, we became very good friends. Some time after this he was to ask me to go and see them at his father's. I went and saw his father and mother, and, more than all, I saw his sister. Really, for the first time, fancy him a woman—refined, brightened, intensely beautified, and you can form some slight idea of Mary Horner. It is impossible for me to describe by the effect she produced upon me from the first. My acquaintance had included some very pretty women, but Mary Horner was a new experience. She fascinated me. You may be sure that I did not get any better the longer I staid within the charmed circle. I got on famously with all the family down there, and fancied that I was not disliked by her. You know what I mean. But I could never detect any thing like symptoms of reciprocal affection. On the contrary, she treated me with cordial but thoroughly self-possessed friendliness." She was not the sort of woman to encourage a lover, and then the exercise, and the general atmosphere of the place, were so conducive to health and happiness that the lady had no reason, at that first visit, to suspect from my appearance the condition of my heart. This was in the summer; but the following winter found me there again. I met some pleasant people whom I had not seen before; among others a Mr. Charles Orenden. He was a really good fellow, an accomplished man, and an agreeable companion. All this I could but acknowledge in spite of the shadow of a consciousness that he was 'something' in the doubtful way relationship subsisting between him and Mary Horner. But there was nothing in the conduct of either that I could call positive of an love-like, even if I had possessed any right to complain at all. I am not prepared to state that on this second visit I might not have, almost involuntarily, betrayed myself, but there had never been the slightest approach to what I believe is called a 'declaration.' Our friendly intercourse had reached the stage of our calling one another by our Christian names. Her brother called me Frank habitually, as I called him Jack (which we should probably never have done if our intimacy had dated from our college days), and she naturally fell, as indeed all the family did, into the same habit. Equally natural it seemed for me to call her Mary. My stay at this time was short. We were an unbroken circle at home at Christmas; and I left, with my secret undivulged, a few days before Christmas-day. But I ought to have told you that I had seen the Percivals frequently between these visits. They were living then near the city, the mother and daughter. Mrs. Percival had been a widow for some years, and I had talked to Mary a little about my admiration of the other Mary. I remember Mrs. Percival was fond of the girl, and seemed often inclined to listen to it. It was not a topic of conversation that I by any means objected to, but I didn't half enjoy the sort of circumstances. There was something unlike herself about Mary, a certain constraint not to be concealed. I could not very positively say that she knew her secret, noticed it, or rather felt it, and was uncomfortable accordingly. At the same time I was pretty sure that she was not indifferent to me, or to the interest she expressed and in her manner toward me.

"There was no affectation in Mary Percival—far from it. Looking back from a later day upon the events and feelings of that time, I was more wise to know the truth, that she was a selfish man who was not a coxcomb. Let me see, where was I? I was going home before Christmas; and one day, early in the new year, I was alone in my chambers, when an idea, which had been a long time germinating, burst into sudden and complete shape. It was to write, to write, Sir, to Mary Horner, and learn the worst or the best. Ah! I can just spoil you now. I write, I have written about it twenty; I wrote. I have a bad habit of spoiling several sheets of paper when I write an important letter. I can show you a dozen home letters, destroyed because of the capital M's which I put for varieties. There it is, read it."

This was the letter:

"MY DEAREST MARY,—I can not call you by any other title and speak truly. Forgive me if the truth is distasteful to you. Forgive me if my speaking of it pains you. In all our happy association I have not dared—yes, this is the word—to tell you this. I have feared you with a butbut the bright particular star always seemed so far above me! These are calm words, Mary, but my love is warm. I stress are cold words, when my heart is beating wildly. I would not read my sentences, if it is to be known to but oh! I would ten thousand times rather hear it, if it has one word of pain for you. Let me have that word, and I will be with you. In my case, I feel that you will deal tenderly as well as truly with me.

"YOURS, devotedly, FRANK."

"Is that same hour," he continued, "I decided to tell Mary Percival what I had written. There is a pretty accurate copy of my letter to her."

It ran thus:

"I know, dear Mary, that I do not look in vein for sympathy from you. I need it greatly to-day. You will believe this when I tell you that I have come to a resolution to ask some one to give me her heart. Can you guess to whom? If you can't, I am not disposed to help you. I can not say more now than that in all my fortunes I am confident of your sincere regard.

"YOURS, affectionately, FRANK."

When I had read this without remark Blundell went on with his narrative.

"I had finished these letters and folded them when there was a rap at my door, followed immediately by the entrance of my opposite neighbor. 'Well, I guess' he said in his confident, 'are you out of coal?' I looked round upon the black grate for answer, having first put the letters into envelopes and fastened them. 'I'll send you some' he proclined for a skate,' my visitor said. 'I tried the ice on the 'Park' yesterday: it was pretty good. Say you'll come with me. I am not disposed to accept any more now than that in all my fortunes I am confident of your sincere regard.

Araminta and I just ran up and got our things and slipped home again.

"That deceitful man," said Minty.

"That bold Liddy Lizer," I gasped, and wonder I didn't turn into a pillar of stone.

It's a good while since then. Araminta is thirty and not married yet, for young Tompkins married some one else out of pique. And I often wonder whether people know Mrs. Ashton was nothing but the Trabe Liddy Lizer.

MY MOTHER'S GRAVE.

My mother's grave, my mother's grave!
Oh, dreamless is her slumber there,
And drowsily the banners wave
O'er her that was so chaste and fair!
Yes, love is dead, and so has passed
But with the dew is on the brake,
And silence sleeps on earth and sea,
And mourners weep, and ghosts awake,
Oh, then she cometh back to me,
In her cold beauty darkly shaded!

I can not guess her face or form;
But what to me is form or face?
I do not ask the weary worm
To give me back each buried grace
Of glistening eye or trailing tresses!
I only feel that she is here,
And that we meet, and that we part;
And that I drink within mine ear,
And that I clasp around my heart,
Her sweet still voice, and soft caresses

Not in the waking thought by day,
Not in the sightless dream by night,
Do the cold tones and glances play
Of her who was my cradle's light!
But in some twilight of calm weather
She glides, by fancy dimly wrought,
A glittering cloud, a darkling beam,
With all the quiet of a thought,
And all the passion of a dream,
Linked in a golden spell together.

TWO WAYS OF USING STRENGTH.

THE little village of Stoke-Regis, which lies hidden in a gap of the Downshire hills, was always celebrated for its strong men.

There was a tradition, as firmly believed in the place as the old Norman church, or the fragments of a Druid's circle, which stood like a ring of old jagged teeth on the top of the highest hill, that Stoke-Regis had been the most famous giants. The names of many heroes of this kind recorded in old story-books were claimed as Stoke-Regis Downshire names, and many a ludicrous wrestlers of modern times were known to have been Downshire men. All this tended to keep up the worship of physical strength in Stoke-Regis, and such worship was easily turned into bad channels. A Downshire man, named Tom Dibbles, whose father belonged to Stoke-Regis, and whose mother came from an adjoining village, called Stoke-Brewin, was engaged as a farm-laborer by a squire of the "old school"—a patron of wrestling, boxing, single-stick, fighting, and other brutal sports. This squire, whose name was Southern, looked upon a man much as he looked upon a horse—as an animal which was worth nothing more than its bone, muscle, flesh, and strength. If any colt in his stable looked promising, he had it trained for the race-course, and if any man on his estate looked promising, he had him trained as a prize-fighter. He kept bull-dogs, game cocks, and other animals to vary his sports; but he thought more of a good muscular pugilist than of all these animals.

"Thee bean't Stoke-Regis, be 'ee?" said the squire one day, as Tom was working hard in a potato-field.

"Nos," said Tom, touching his hair, and looking up from his work; "fayther wur Stoke-Regis, mother wur Stoke-Brewin."

"Would 'ee loike to foight a Stoke-Regis man, if I foind 'ee wun?" asked the squire.

"Fight a man in thick there mead," replied Tom, pointing to a closely cropped meadow, "if you'll go' I wages for day's work."

The squire was struck, and the squire looked about for a strong Stoke-Regis man. He soon found one in the person of Harry Wold, a man about Tom Dibble's height, and stronger, they said, who was out of his employment. Both men were put into fair training by the squire, who paid all the expenses, and kept them for a month while they were preparing for their physical condition. There was much excitement in the two villages, and indeed throughout Downshire, and many bets were made upon the contest. Umpires were chosen from both villages, and it was arranged that the trial should begin with a wrestling-match. The place chosen for the contest was a meadow on Squire Southern's estate, and a small piece of gold was to be the prize awarded to the winner.

We may pass over all details of the struggle—all descriptions of the village crowd who came to witness it. The struggle was very brief and brutal; the drunkenness and disorder which prevailed were equally brutal, and not so brief. Tom Dibble threw the Stoke-Regis man—Harry Wold—heavily on his back—so heavily that he could never have risen without assistance. His spine was injured, so the doctor in attendance said; and the crowd were disappointed of their sport—the fight that was to follow the wrestling-match. The squire—a man as coarse as his peasants—took no pains to conceal his vexation.

Tom Dibbles after this victory became the hero of Stoke-Brewin. Stoke-Brewin was an exact counter part of Stoke-Regis, and Squire Southern's property reached almost to its borders. Harry, who was a long time—a very long time, before he recovered the use of his legs—and when he began to hobble about with a stick, he looked like a prematture old man. He was still kept in the Squire's employ and received his usual wages, but the Squire evidently disliked him, and had not the delicacy to conceal his dislike. Stoke-Regis took its tone from the Squire, and Harry Wold, though he worked, or was supposed to work on the Squire's estate, was compelled to live in Stoke-Brewin.

Stoke-Brewin showed its admiration for Tom Dibbles by presenting him with a silver jug, on which was an inscription, drawn up by the village schoolmaster, recording the victory. The trifling fact that Stoke-Brewin had only furnished a mother for its hero was not mentioned in this inscription. Tom was persuaded to transfer his physical advantages to London, where muscular young men were much in request as prize-fighters, and he went one day by a stage-coach which passed near the village, leaving an only son as his representative in Stoke-Brewin. He could not take his silver jug—his silver mug, with him, because it was mortgaged to the ale-house keeper for a long score of beer and tobacco.

Tom's career in London was disappointing. He was soon defeated by a negro fighting-man, and was ashamed to return to Downshire. He hung about the purlieus of Soho and St. Giles's for a few years, and at last died of gin and consumption in one of the hospitals.

Young Tom Dibbles, who was left in Stoke-Brewin, had more than his father's strength, but none of his father's ambition. Many Stoke-Brewin men spurred him on to challenge a Stoke-Regis man, and when he showed no inclination for the contest, or refused outright, he was looked upon as a bad son and a degenerate villager. Many, however, who felt inclined to call him a coward, had not the courage to do so; for Stoke-Brewin is fair, round, upon face was beaming with good-nature, there was something about him even more than his physical strength, which shielded determination and a spirit of endurance. The question of his courage was soon set at rest at a fire which occurred at a farm-house on Squire Southern's estate. It broke out into a burning barn, where some poor tramping hay-makers were huddled with their children, and dragged them out of the suffocating flames at the risk of the life of his life. One of his cheeks got frightfully scarred in this adventure—the mark being one which he would carry to his grave. The people he had saved were not Stoke-Brewin, nor even Downshire people, and he was not presented with a piece of gold, nor even with a testimonial mug for his heroism, but there were no whispers now about his cowardice.

Young Tom had no family ties, and having the strength of two men, he used it like a good genius in the village. Whatever was wanted to be improved in and around Stoke-Brewin and Stoke-Regis, the most useless exhibitions of physical power were called in failure, and Tom was sent for to do the job. He did the farthest, or could pull against a plowhorse, or could perform any other trick leading to no useful result. He was the hero of the whole village and ale-house. In the mean time many of the village roofs were unthatched, the pathways between the houses were full of pools of water, and many cottages had sunk into hovels for want of a little labor and attention; a dam in a small river—the only water-power in the village—had been worn from a flood, if a wet season sent the waters down from the hills—was left unrepaired, and the village mill—the little village school-house, which was never respected by the Stoke-Brewin people, was more like a half-ruined stable than a comfortable building; the church-yard was rank with weeds, and the whole place, much like Stoke-Regis, furnished similes for fat and lean kine, and for the poverty of the country. The chief men of the village seemed to be blind to this disgrace that existed under their eyes, and they lived in contempt of all improvement. Rival mugs fights and physical contests in which their Stoke-Brewin champions had been victorious.

Young Tom Dibbles, as he grew older, became less and less of their way of thinking, and more determined to use his strength for the real benefit of the village. While he was engaged in this work he had given them—that natural health and physical power, which wealth can not always purchase—he was in his like a useful, comfortable, Christian man, as he turned out to be.

Old Harry Wold, who had long been a broken-down laborer on the same Southern estate, was hardly work sufficiently to maintain his position; and when old Squire Southern died from a hunting-fall, he was threatened with the workhouse. He had young Tom Dibbles had long been friends, and the old man had been a kind friend to the boy when young one. Tom had to work hard for his living, as the Downshire wages were not high, but still he found time to help Harry Wold. He soon found that the father had made Harry Wold's life a burden to him, and had probably shortened it by many years, pothing and pampering him with strong beer. Old Harry's one-roomed hovel was repaired in the night with stones gathered from the stream of a neighboring village, and thatched and repaired at the same time. The old man never saw Tom at work upon this task, as it was done when he was dead asleep, but the villagers knew what had been done, and who had done it, and it set them thinking.

"I be dun vur, Meester Tom," the old man said one night, drawing in a low stool, "there be nowt atween I and work-hus."

"Thee bean't dun for yet, if I know it," replied Tom, who was busy at the fire-place with a mountain.

The old man had told him how he was bewitched, hand with his rent, and how troubles never come single. His landlord was the executor of his late village—hearing that young Squire Southern was about to cast him off, had threatened to turn him out of the hut and seize his few poor bits of furniture on the following morning.

Tom Dibbles was not a rich laborer, in fact he had nothing but eighteen-pence in his pocket, but he had property which he was determined to turn into money. The silver mug—the pride of the village—the record of his failure in struggle with the old man—was a useless chattel in his possession, and he resolved to sell it. The market-town of Downham was twelve miles off, but he started at once at full speed, and reached it before all the shop-keepers had gone to bed. He found a working watchmaker and silversmith, who purchased it as old metal, and Tom hurried back with the welcome money, and arrived at Stoke-Brewin before old Harry Wold had risen from his straw-bed.

The rent was paid, and thus half the difficulty was got rid of; but the other half remained to be dealt with. Tom was equal to the task. Luckily he had a friend in Squire Southern's overseer, and he got himself yoked as a fellow-laborer with old Harry Wold. From that moment the old man ceased to have goodness or strength. His tasks, no matter how hard, were well done, and done quickly. He dug potatoes, trimmed hedges, dug ditches, and ran errands as well as the youngest laborer on the estate, and his wages were always as much as young Tom Dibbles's. The truth oozed out at last, and the whole village thinking Tom was seen by a couple of loiterers at a stile wheeling a heavy load up a steep hill, while the old man walked at his side quietly and thoughtfully.

Tom's example was not lost upon Stoke-Brewin, nor yet upon Stoke-Regis. Strong men, under his guidance, began mending pathways, repairing the cottages, weeding the church-yard, and rebuilding the school-house and dam, and found in this work an amusement after their task-labor was finished. Tom was loved by the young, and respected by the old, and worshiped by all to be the good genius of the village.

THE MOST NORTHERLY TOWN IN THE WORLD.

HAMMERFEST is the most northerly town in the world. It is in the province of Finmarken, and is situated on the island Kvalöen, in lat. 70° 40'. Toward the southwest it is hemmed in by steep cliffs. It is truly a barren spot, though once it is said to have been well wooded. It is a commercial port Hammerfest is of some importance. During the summer months the harbor is crowded with Russian, English, and other vessels, and though the principal trade consists in dried codfish, a large quantity of which is sent to the Mediterranean ports to be consumed by the Roman Catholics of Southern Europe.

Were it not for the climatic influence that the Gulf Stream exerts, Hammerfest, and indeed the whole northern parts of the Scandinavian peninsula, would be uninhabitable, and as ice-bound as Boothia Felix, Victoria Land, and those desolate regions which in the other hemisphere which lie under the same parallel of latitude. But, as it is, the sea never freezes during the whole of the year round at Norway. Icebergs are rarely or never seen; and it is also owing to this warm influence that vegetation exists at the North Cape and at Christiania, though thirteen degrees of latitude lie between them, is one and the same.

During the summer, which may be reckoned to last from the middle of May till toward the latter part of August, the Finmarken Hammerfest presents a lively appearance. The weather then is intensely hot, for, as the sun never sets from July 15 till August 30, the rays of the sun never become cool.

We would recommend the traveler who may be bound for the far north to see the midnight sun, or to place his feet on the northern verge of the European continent, not to forget to bring with him a liberal supply of eau-de-Cologne. He will find it useful as a fumigator, and the whole place reeks with a fishy odor. There is a tolerable hotel, perhaps rather dear in its charges; but to be able to drink English porter, champagne, and even to play billiards under the same degree of latitude as that which runs over Disco Island, one must not grumble.

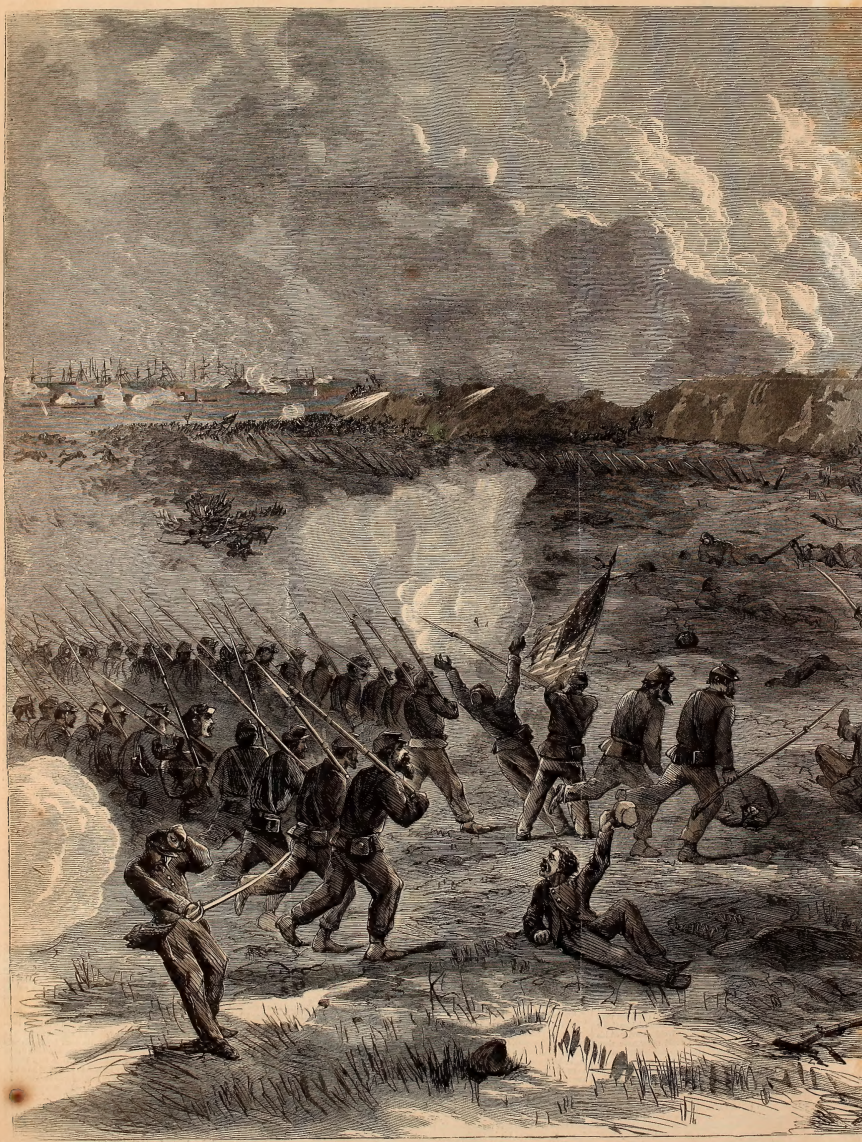
I can scarcely imagine any thing but necessity inducing a man to pitch his tent so far north as Hammerfest, and the governor, who has lived there several years, declares it to be a delightful residence, and one which he would on no account exchange for Tromsoe. That he does a large business as a general merchant, that he has taken quite himself a Norwegian wife, and has created a nest of affection. From May 24 to July 19 the sun never sinks below the horizon, but for a correspondingly short time there is a glimpse of him to be seen. But it is a mistake to think that even then there is total darkness during the daytime. At midnight, with a sufficiently light to be able to read without candles, for the moon and the stars shine with a much greater brilliancy the farther north one goes, and the reflection of the aurora borealis on the snow contributes in no little degree to illumine the scene. I have witnessed some very distant approaches to the northern lights in the south of Norway, but have never been so fortunate as to see them in the far north. The phenomenon is said to be common enough in Finmarken. And the following description may serve to give a faint idea:

"Across the sky to the north stretched a white arch of light, which, as it rose to a meridian. A large streak shaped like a comet lay within the arch, and this was continually changing both its figure and extent. Sometimes the aurora never gave so lively, so hallowed a light." At times it appears like a curtain of fire falling perpendicularly to the earth, and lifting again; at others, like a golden shower; or, again, like a huge fan, displaying all the colors of the rainbow.

It is a strange phenomenon, but I never staid twenty-four hours in any place in Norway without having at least one fine display to go after a meal. Once, but only once, was I fool enough to accept it, for after having lain flat on my stomach all night in close proximity to the putrid carcase of a horse, and getting nearly devoured by mosquitoes, and, of course, seeing nothing, I made a vow never to go bear-hunting, nay more. There are, however, several bears in Finmarken, and large numbers are annually slaughtered by the Lapps, mostly in the winter time or early spring, on account a merchant. In Hammerfest gave me of a bear-hunt put me much in mind of rabbiting at home.

When the ground is covered with snow the hunter repairs to the bear-den, whither Bruin has been previously tracked. He generally takes with him three or four companions. All of them go on "skie," the Norwegian snow-shoe, whereby they can skim over the surface of the snow at railroad speed. They are armed with rifles, axes, and bear-spears—long poles about eight to ten feet in length, furnished at one end with a sharp iron head. On arriving at the entrance to the den, which much resembles a fox-earth, they range themselves round it. One of their number now tries to arouse Bruin from his profound slumber by "stirring him up with a long pole." This generally has the desired effect; for presently the bear comes sleepily to the hole and puts his head out to see what all the fuss is about. Down comes an axe upon his "devoted head," which is quickly drawn in again. Again the pole is inserted, and at last Bruin gets so savage that he determines to make his exit. Somewhat roused up, he makes a dart out, like a rabbit with a ferret behind him. The dogs are then slipped and set off in full chase. The bear is easily caught up, for his heavy weight sinks deep into the snow. Squatting on his haunches to secure his most vulnerable part against the attacks of his relative assailants, he deals out tremendous blows right and left with his powerful paws. Woe to the luckless dog if he comes in for one of them! Meanwhile the hunter comes up and calls his dogs off. He then takes his cap off and throws it in Bruin's face, and defies him to the contest. If the bear accepts it he seizes himself on his hind-legs and rushes at the hunter, who runs for the first tree he sees, and, most generally Bruin succumbs to his ballet; for the Lapps are unerring marksmen.

But, even though mortally wounded, the beast will not "throw up the sponge" in token of defeat, but dashes against his adversary, who keeps him at a respectful distance with his bear-spear. Bruin becomes cool up and administer the "coup de grace." On one such occasion it happened that the hunter's paste broke short off. The bear, though mortally wounded, was still dangerous. It managed to reach the hunter, and gave him such a hug in his paws that he thought the life-blood of his body pantomime. would be squeezed out. "But I knew," said the plucky little Lapp, "that his strength would soon fail, and that my pals' friends would protect me against his last claws; so watching a good opportunity, I plunged my knife into his heart.



But it is not the bear only that are good hunters. One day a Lapp woman went out to fish on a lake, accompanied by her son, who was fourteen years old. He had not caught a sufficient supply they landed on a part of the shore which was thickly overgrown with fir and underwood. Presently the boy missed his mother, and fell to a search of boughs, reeds, moss, etc., and, on nearer inspection, she found a large hole underneath the mass of rubbish, and felt convinced it was the entrance to a bear's "lie," or cave. She was a courageous and resolute little body, and, nothing daunted by the discovery, nor reflecting that she was alone, hastened back to the boat to fetch her axe and rifle (for a Lapp woman generally carries a gun with her, ready for any unexpected shot). Now her sisters in other parts of the civilized world would most probably have been frightened out of their wits, and have run away bodily; not so treat under such circumstances. Her only anxiety was lest the bear should get off.

On returning she found the cub cut down a small fir sapling, which she pointed at one end, and gave it the boy to bradble about in the hole to ascertain whether the animal was there, while she stood with uplifted axe a little on one side. No sooner was the pole inserted than out came the head of a monstrous she-bear, and down came the axe on her skull with such force that it remained sticking fast in the wound, and accompanied Bruin's rush as she treated to the farthest end of the cave. Time being up for round number two, and her opponent not putting in an appearance, she determined to go after him at once. So taking the axe she fired down the hole than out bolted a cub about the size of a sheep dog, which her son cleverly managed to knock on the head by hitting it. He was too strong for the little fellow, and, after dragging him for some distance, succeeded in killing it. Determined, however, not to lose him, mother and son went in pursuit, and speedily overtook the animal, which had taken to a tree. A few vigorous hatchet-blows at the end of the cut son rendered him hors de combat.

Having secured him, the courageous little woman went back again to the "lie," and gave it another stirring up. But all was still. Next she fired a charge into the cave, but to no purpose. Fearing that the beast must be dead, or else have escaped during her absence, she determined to dig her out, a work which, from the success hitherto attended her exertions; for at length she found the bear lying quite dead, with the axe still sticking in her cleft skull, and a bullet through her heart. She at this first, with a bullet wound through his neck, also dead.

No mean achievement for a woman and her boy!

I think the midnight sun is to be seen in fuller perfection from the North Cape than from Hammerfest. One evening, after leaving Hammerfest, we were all assembled on deck to witness its setting and rising, if that it can be termed. It was about eleven o'clock. The sky was of a brilliant gold color, and the sea lay all around us like a burnished mirror. In the south it assumed a delicate rose-colored tint, merging into an apple green. The effect of the sunlight on the bluff headlands was tremendously beautiful; for, as the sun sunk lower and lower, chameleon-like their tints kept changing, till at last they seemed to be bathed in a vermillion hue. It was now obscured by the chronometer. In a few minutes we noticed the sun gradually rising higher and higher; and now, strange to say, the colors we had noticed before its setting were of a totally different hue. Altogether it was the most lovely and varied scene I have ever witnessed. But it only succeeded slight almost imperceptibly. It required no little attention to prevent confusion in our journals. I can well imagine that one can readily "lose a day" up there.

THE ASSAULT AND CAPTURE

OF FORT FISHER, JANUARY 15, 1865.

"BLESSED TO GIVE."

THE kingly sun gives forth his rays;
Asks no return; demands no praise;
But wraps us in strong arms of life,
And says distinct through thunder, strife,
"If thou wouldst truly, nobly live,
Give—ever give."

The rustic flower, unspringing bright,
And scentless, save in that regal light,
Fills all the air with fragrant breath,
And writes in myriad hues beneath,
"If thou wouldst gayly, gladly live,
Give—ever give."

The merchant-rain, which carries on
Rich commerce 'twixt the earth and sun;
The autumn mist; the springtide shower;
All whisper soft, and whisper first,
"We know no other life to live
But this—We give."

Suggestive warnings crowd the earth;
Glad sounds of labor, songs of mirth,
From creatures both of field and air;
Who, while they take their rightful share,
Still truly chant, "We chiefly live
To give—to give."

O man! the gem and crown of all,
Take thou this lesson. Heed the call
Of these low-gliding creatures near:
The rather, that Christ's voice most dear
Once said, while here He deigned to live,
"Blessed to give."

STORY OF AN AUSTRALIAN DETECTIVE.

I AM a detective in the Victoria police, and have been one for some years; I was formerly one in Paris, and I was employed as such in the Hyde Park Exhibition of 1851. Since then I have been in various parts of the world; in fact there are very few of the force that haven't knocked about the world a good deal. Directly I left, I had been settled in Australia, and hope my roving is ended. I have never had but one crack case intrusted to my care; I have sometimes had to help others on the diggings into the interior, and found them boundary riders on stations, or clerks that did not keep their accounts straight, and so on; but nothing worth carrying specially to, but these were small affairs; a pair of bracelets soon settled such; but once I had a matter to deal out on the very highest principles conceived, which required all my skill and all the resources of my long experience. Some four years ago there lived about a mile down the Sydney Road, outside the bridge, an odish man, who was reported to have made somewhere a good "pile." He was a thorough hermit, seldom stirred except to go down to Sydney and buy a few necessaries, for which he always paid, and never was known to be drawn or haggle about the price of any thing. This naturally led to the surmise that he had plenty of money. Near him lived another odish man in a shed and bark hut; he was a shoemaker by trade, but in a small township like this his customers were but few, and his livelihood precarious. As he was known to be as poor as his neighbor was supposed to be rich, and was as much dependent on the forbearance of his creditors as the other was on his ready-money, between these two solitary men, living on the river side, there sprung up a strangely intimate friendship; always after breakfast, and, through the day, and regularly at night, they had their pipe together, sometimes with a pannikin of tea only, at others with a glass of grog. There was a dim mystery hanging over the supposed rich man's history; where he had come from, or how he had made his money, no one knew, and his chief friend, though very one to ask him, he and the shoemaker were all the world to each other, and beyond that neither seemed to care any thing. In the above companionable mode of life weeks and months passed away; the only difference observable being, that although Stevens, the shoemaker, had no more money than formerly, he now seemed to have money always at command, and not only paid off his old scores but had ready money for all he needed.

One morning, however—it was in the winter season, and the 15th of June—nothing its turbulent wayfarers, muddy and swift, down to the sea—the old man's hut was not opened; wood splitters passing by observed that the old hermit was not sunning himself and smoking his "catty" as usual, and that night Stevens came running into the township, greatly excited, and crying on Mr. T——, the police, told him that not having seen old Jeffrey all day he had forced an entrance into the hut, but that the old man was not there, and what had become of him he did not know. A policeman, for H——, is a police station, was immediately sent to the hermit's hut, but could find no magistrates should make inquiry. Some days after the inquiry was made, but nothing came of it, further than the suspicious half Jeffrey met with foul play; that nothing was proved, nor could be proved until the body could be found; and that was left to time. Stevens, who could say he had not got up in the night, and so suddenly started from H—— as he had once made his appearance.

As soon as intelligence of this affair reached headquarters at Melbourne the matter was placed in my hands, with instructions to exercise my own discretion in my proceedings, absolving me from all disgrace if I failed, and promising me one hundred pounds if I succeeded. My plan was adopted after much consideration, and I have no reason to regret the steps I took, as will be seen in the sequel. I took the little steamer Waters, Captain Lucas, to Portland, 260 miles, and after stopping a day or two at Mac's celebrated hotel, I started by the mail for the far interior. After days' journey I arrived at H—— as a "traveler" looking for a job of work; I had a tolerably heavy swag, and this with my pannikin and billy gave me all the appearance of a bona fide one. I went straight up to the bar, had my nobbler, lighted my pipe, and then sat down outside to consider my next movement. It was necessary I should have some one in my confidence, but I resolved not to trust the local police, as in these remote stations their life of idleness often makes them loafers and gossips. I resolved to trust Mr. T——, the landlord and postmaster, aside —he had been an officer in the army many years—and tell him my errand, that I should never more see or hear from—and returned as if nothing had occurred. Toward evening the bar was pretty full, and I took the opportunity to say to Mr. T——, "I say, sir, have I was out of work, that I was a groom, that I did not want to go on a station, and should be glad of a chance job. He at once told me of his stable, and tell his foreman to take me on as an extra stable hand. I gave Mr. T—— my swag to take care of; it contained my uniform, and thereby from head-quarters to act as a detective. I understood all, and that was sufficient.

As groom I remained here seven months; able for a long while to do nothing; but feeling more and more confident that the general suspicion of Stevens was well founded. Of course I became intimate with him, but only in the evenings when my work was done; in all respects I acted as an ordinary groom, taking my weekly wages, and carefully avoiding every thing that might lead any one to suppose I was any thing but a groom. Often have I heard villany of as a murderous nature as has ridden up, and called me to take his horse, and give him a feed; however, I kept my own counsel, and little by little light dawned upon my track. Over the never-failing pipe I had frequent conversations with Stevens about this old man; on such occasion he would generally fix his eye upon the ground, which gave me the opportunity to watch him the more narrowly. I could then see the nervous twitchings of his face, the biting of his lip, and the sudden passing of his handkerchief across his mouth, to conceal the fear that he betrayed in this affair than I did. Frequently at the close of our conversations, in which Stevens was making these occasional betrayals, he would say, "I wish to God I'd never seen the money came from. My eyes, however, were steadily fixed on his drinking habits as the key to my researches. Summer came on apace now; though it was a late summer it was a regular hot Australian one: and in the course of a few weeks the following began to be the hot days of the neighborhood of H——, and one evening as I was talking to Stevens about this I said, "I'll be off to-morrow, and get out of the remains of Jeffrey, and pay claim to the Government reward." I noticed at this time how quiet a man Stevens could be tried to conceal it I saw that he trembled all over, and though generally very mild spoken, he got quite angry with me, and told me I ought to be ashamed of myself for such a proposal. I replied: "Why, I was told that Jeffrey was murdered, and have always said he made away with himself." "I thought so once, but now, the more I think over the matter, the more convinced I am he was murdered." "That has to be proved," said I, "and to prove it we must first find the remains, and as the river flows by I have no doubt we shall find them in one of the water-holes near his hut." This was not exactly a guess, but was a conclusion arrived at from facts. First, Jeffrey was a rich man, and, supposing him to have been the murderer, could not have carried Jeffrey far; and secondly every one knows that murderers, when they do not go forethought to carry their victims far from the scene of the murder. As soon as I had said this Stevens rose, and, in a half-jocular way, said, "Let's have a nobbler; I can't stand this everlasting talk about a murdered man." We had our glass and parted for the night; but my mind was already made up. Stevens, beyond doubt, was the murderer, and I was on the high road to the end. I began to defend our code of morals. I admit that often do evil that good may come; but society should not employ so low a class of men as those I mean to condemn us for our questionable methods of procedure. It was now late in January, and the weather had normally set in. Thunderstorms were now rapidly the Glenelg ceased to be a river, and how each day the water-holes became shallower and shallower. Promptly at eight A.M. a messenger, from a neighboring magistrate, orders for the police to examine every water-hole within a mile on either side of Jeffrey's hut. This was the day I was known Stevens was down at the bar trying, I suppose, to smother his memory in deep potations of rum. Directly the police were dismissed, having the river I discharged myself, and having obtained my check, proceeded, or pretended, to spend the day in the accustomed way. Stevens, as on every body known, means staying in the bar and every night did the same. This was very exhausting do; I kept myself sober as a judge; behind the scenes I prompted every thing: through Mr. T—— I supplied every one they had nothing to be taken, and now I had only to wait the result of the searching and dragging these water-holes. Those who know the country know that this is no easy matter, and that it occupies considerable time. Sometimes only two or three could be searched in a day, on others more. While this was going on Stevens became almost a resident in the bar, seldom leaving it, but betraying the most intense and childish curiosity as to the result of the search. "I've been down to any thing?" or, "Haven't they found any thing yet?" or, "Well, I should have thought they would have found something by this time;" were expressions that frequently fell from his lips. It was, I think, the fourth day of search, and Stevens had been drinking hard all the time; on the afternoon of that day a sack was found with human remains in it at the bottom of a hole; and on the evening of that same day drink and excitement had rendered Stevens incapable of taking care of himself, and, at my suggestion, he was carried to the lock-up as drunk and disorderly. I too, though perfectly sober, affected to be quite out on the spree, and was also locked up in the same place with Stevens, and my name also entered on the night-charge-list as drunk and disorderly. Never saw such a change in a man as came over Stevens when he found I was locked up with him. The effects of the drink were passing away, and the strong mental excitement produced by the discovery of these remains; and no sooner was the lock turned on me than he clasped me by the hand as the "Groom that had always been so friendly," and began to cry piteously like a child. His thoughts were running on the murder, and I resolved to use the opportunity. To make this right I began—"I say, Stevens, do you know they have found the old man's body? It was in a sack, and the sack was weighted with stones; and one of the stones, they say, was your baptstone. He skull is broken in two places, so that it is plain he must have died very suddenly. What made you talk about him in your sleep just now?" "Did I? what did I say?" "You said if they would let you off you would show them where his money was." (This he said said in his sleep.) Upon this he gave a convulsive shriek, fell back upon the straw and exclaimed—"Yes, I killed old Jeffrey—but don't preach on me; they can only bring me up for being an accessory after the fact. He gave me all the money. I say, groom, you won't preach, will you? I will leave these parts. I have had too much blood to-day. Let me have a bit; you every thing to-morrow; but don't preach, and I'll make a clean breast of it." Before the morning broke he had confessed every thing. I had always been a good fellow, and he didn't mind telling Mr. T——'s groom every thing. He had entered the old man's hut at midnight, struck him in the skull, put the body in a sack, and, fool that he was, put in his own lapstone along with other stones to make it sink, and had hid his money under the mud floor of his cottage. The next morning we were both brought before the magistrate of the district charged as aforesaid. On being remanded I had to say I handed the magistrate my authority to act as detective, and requested to be placed in the witness-box, as I had a charge of murder to prefer against Stevens, who was there on the minor charge. In less time than it takes to tell this I had left the room, and greatly to the astonishment of every one, especially of the local police, the well-known groom at H—— was in his uniform, bringing his charge against Stevens, founded on the confession of murdering the old hermit Jeffrey.

The scene is soon told; my evidence hung Stevens, who again and again, previous to his execution, confessed not only this murder, but the murder of a man in the bush some years back, with whom he was working on a station making a stake and rail fence.

A LOVE-TALE.

BY AN OLD FOGEY.

It was the old story; fresh and new to Harry as the words fall from his fluent lips. Bless the lad! He thought that, for all his experiences, were quite novel, that mortal had never uttered the like before —it was just as if some one were telling me my own love-story, word for word, with the names changed. A young man with next to nothing had fallen deeply in love with the daughter of rich parents—they are to bad enough, Heaven knows. How Harry clung to that pledge! He knew she would be true to him! I looked up at his face, I saw how hopeful and confident he was, and, twenty odd years ago I too had been very hopeful, very confident, but—

"Why, father," he exclaimed—he often called me father—"what's in your eyes?"

"They are not so young as they were, Harry," I replied, glad of the excuse; "I don't think these glasses quite suit me." "Oh, my boy, you haven't said any thing to Brown yet?"

"Why, I haven't had a good opportunity, but perhaps to-morrow night—" he answered, hesitatingly.

I was agreed that Harry should call for me at my little bachelor box, and that we should go together to Brown's. He came at the appointed moment; the lad was punctuality itself in matters of life; we did not speak much as we drove along. I recollect thinking that Brown ought to be proud of such a son-in-law.

I know that I was very nervous when we arrived at Brown's, and I fancy Harry was also. There was a look of anxiety about the house that spoke of "family dinner" required, for, although Brown is as rich as Croesus, he is an essentially mean man, and never engenders a display unless it is advantageous to do so.

Mrs. Brown was in the drawing-room, and received us with her usual frigidity. Her dress was a magnificent triumph of cost over taste, and her manner told me in a moment that she had never intended us to be welcome. Presently in came Brown and his daughter. Brown was very cordial in his manner, only I could see he did not mean it; he was profoundly civil to Harry, engaging him in eager conversation, which prevented Harry from more than saying "How dye do?" to Fanny, who sat some way apart. She really is a very pretty girl, a charming figure, dark hair, dark, pensive eyes, a mess delicately retrousse—I wish I could describe faces; I can't, I can only say it was a face that went to your heart and stopped there—the red rose twined in that dark hair, and the misty white dress, it was a pretty sight, even to my old eyes.

Presently, bang bang! bang bang! at the house door.

In a moment Mrs. Brown's stately aspect forsook her, she grew very nervous, and Brown fidgeted about the room in an anxious manner.

The Honorable Mrs. Denby and Mr. Denby were announced.

They appeared to be mother and son, and were evidently people of great account, Mr. and Mrs. Brown being so wonderfully deferential in their greeting. I could see Mr. Denby's well-bred lip curl beneath the overwhelming attentions of Mrs. Brown; as for Mrs. Brown herself, his lead was totally lost—he introduced us under wrong names, and left every one at random about the weather, and at last subsided into hopeless silence on a spindle chair.

Mrs. Denby's easy manner lulled the sensibilities of Mrs. Brown, and they sat confidentially talking on a sofa, whence the murmur of their conversation fell on my ears.

As for that fellow Denby I took a dislike to the man at once; there was a supercilliousness about him that grated unpleasantly on me.

Dinner was announced; Brown's head was off again.

To my astonishment I was thrust half-way toward the door with Mrs. Denby on my arm; Harry in the scramble had got hold of Fanny; when a false start was declared, the order of the company was changed, and Fanny was assigned to Denby.

"Treat you quite in a friendly way!" said Brown, gompously, addressing the company generally, "I was out of patience to hear the man talk such nonsense. It was a most elaborate dinner; the table was arranged with dazzling fusees, delicately modeled, crowned with flower and fruit surtouts.

"Quite in a friendly way, ma'am," said Brown, addressing Mrs. Denby specially. I could see the smile which Mrs. Denby took care to hide from her host; she was evidently a woman of great tact; in a few minutes Brown was talking to her quite at his ease about the Stock Exchange.

Harry sat between Mrs. Denby and myself, she contrived to draw him into conversation—poor boy! I could see he was ill at ease; the constant worry of the table completely shut him out from Fanny, who sat opposite with Denby.

I declare I felt quite angry at the way that fellow Denby kept on talking to Fanny; I could see he completely bored her. I tried to divert his conversation to myself. I spoke to him upon every subject I could think of, but he only vouchsafed polite monosyllables to me and still kept on conversing with Fanny—and then Mrs. Brown attacked me on the flank and forced me to listen to her.

"Did I know Mr. This That? a very handsome man! and that Mrs. Other, such a beautiful woman! didn't I think so? and then her cousin the celebrated What's-her-name."

I told Mrs. Brown I was not acquainted with any of these people; but nothing could stop her conversation about fashionable folks. I was determined, however, not to be diverted from my intention of breaking up Denby's conversation with Fanny. I based my attack upon the great political question; at last I observed that he began to listen to me with attention. I was never so wearied of an affair in my life, and was quite relieved when the ladies left us.

All this time Brown had been gradually getting into a state of stupor. I think that dinner is a great democrat and leveler of distinctions. Dinner, at least, had this effect upon Brown; he became quite at home with Denby, calling him "My boy! Old fellow!" toasting him as future chairman of the Underground Railroad Company. I could see that Denby winced under all this, but he was just as polite as his mother.

"It must be that the man is hard up and wants to borrow money," I thought; I had been reasoning, too, of all the attention he has been paying to Brown's daughter." At last Brown grew supremely confident, for he informed us that he was one of the prominent objects in the room, from the fine dessert service on the table to the black old mastiffs on the rug.

At length a move was made for the drawing-room; the two younger gentlemen had departed, and I was about to follow them, when Brown playfully detained me by the tails of my coat, and then, as I was such an old friend, he confided to me his plans for securing the daughter Denby, who was, he told me, the rich old Mr. Debtford's nephew, and would succeed to his wealth.

I could not trust myself to answer him. I was never more agitated in my life than when I entered the drawing-room. I found that Harry was looking at some photographs which Harry was turning over for her; Mrs. Denby was also looking at the same photographs with great attention. I felt that that clever lady had discovered the real state of affairs. Denby was engaged in conversation with Miss Brown. I joined myself to the photograph party, and stood racking my head to find something that would entertain Mrs. Denby, and so allow the lovers a few minutes; but my eyes grew quite peculiar and my head was a great blank. At last, to my relief, Brown came up and requested his daughter to sing. She instantly obeyed, and went to the pianoforte, accompanied by Harry. I made a strong effort, and feigned intense enthusiasm for a photograph which was before Mrs. Denby.

"Magnificent effect, that doorway!" said I; "light and shade wonderful! the details perfect!" I was watching the lovers all the time I spoke; they were making the selection of the music an excuse for a few words.

"Very cleverly executed," said Mrs. Denby, in reply to my observations. "I recollect the scene perfectly." I glanced down at her. She was not looking at the photograph; her eyes were also devoted to the lovers. "Frederick!" she exclaimed, addressing her son. "Mrs. Brown, would you be kind enough to allow him? I want him to ask your daughter to sing that favorite song of mine—" "Farewell," I think it's called;" and giving her son a significant glance she took his place beside Mrs. Brown. Denby went immediately to the pianoforte. I declare I was in such a rage I could almost have quarreled with the man when Brown come up and would make me listen to some stupid story. At last Harry left the piano-forte and whispered to me that we had better go, that our remaining was merely a useless distress to Fanny. We took leave with as good grace as possible. I could see triumph in Mrs. Denby's gray eyes as I bowed to her, and I saw how intently she watched Fanny as the girl hurriedly snatched her hand from Harry's lingering grasp.

We agreed that the only thing was for Harry to write to Brown immediately. When we got to my cottage I persuaded the boy to come in and dry the night. I lighted the candles in my little sanctum. Harry sat down at the table pen in hand. I took up a book, which I pretended to read in my armchair, but I was watching him all the time. He wrote and tore up, and wrote again, till the pen trembled in his hand. It came back to me with wonderful clearness that night of my life when I had been engaged in writing a letter of the same kind. I appreciated in the agitation, the fevered anxiety which beset him, for I had experienced it years before.

"I can't tell what to write to Brown!" he exclaimed; "to do try and assist me." I put down my book and came close to him. I dictated a sentence, which he wrote. "That's just what I wanted to say!" he exclaimed. The words seemed strangely familiar to me. I looked over his shoulder at what he had written. I remembered it in a moment; they were the words of my own letter years ago. "Dear Sir," he wrote anxiously. It was not the use of words that kept me silent; the old words were ready enough on my tongue. I was puzzling out new language in my head. I could find no new thoughts; every sentence insensibly shaped itself to the old form. He kept urging me to dictate, and in the end there was my old letter copied almost as it seemed to me, word for word.

It was with sad feelings that I conned over that letter to make corrections. Harry looking at it with the young feelings and young eyes with which I had looked at my former letter years ago. It appears to me unfavorably good letter in its way, because Harry declared it expressed exactly what he had wished to say.

"It's all true, so convincing!" he exclaimed. "That part where you hint at the uncertainty of wealth, the little value of high-sounding positions when life is so short—considerations like those must influence even a man like Brown."

Well, I must recollect in my day that I had scanned over and over again that bit of moralizing, and its incontestable truth had seemed, to my anxious eyes, reason to hurry for father's blessing, but the longer I now looked at the words through my glasses the more trite and unsatisfactory did they become.

I told him he must not be too sanguine.

"But that part of the letter is so true," he urged, with confidence.

"Quite true," I replied. "Why there's not a man living who would not readily confess that he sees very well that death makes quick ending of social distinctions; but you must not think that Brown's readiness to acknowledge that abstract truth will make a jot of difference to his thirst for worldly position and wealth."

He looked at me with mixed surprise and sadness.

"No no, my boy," I continued; "logic is very rarely the guide to rule men's lives. Sometimes it may just as well chance the letter, only I don't want you to build too hopefully upon its effect."

So the letter was sent to Brown by Harry gave me Brown's answer to read a day or two after in my office. I read the result I had feared in his countenance. He was striving to be so very calm and self-possessed. Well, Brown's reply was very like the answer I had received years ago; I suppose in these love matters there is a set of common-place forms supplied to men's minds which they use and modify at their need. I thought to myself whether it would be any use for me to see Brown, but before I could determine whether it would be any use or not I was off.

It happened I was the very man Brown wanted to see; he had been on the point of coming to me; he had wished to have a talk about the Company; he had made an appointment with Denby, who would be with us in a few minutes. That man's name started me on my subject at once. I began to recollect the details of our connection, I was so greatly excited; I believe in my desire to move him I recounted my own history, my early love and disappointment; how it had cankered my existence, the sorrow which had attended her marriage with the man she disliked. Brown stared at me with surprise in his stolid face. "You," said he—"you, such a plain, practical, business-man, I could not have believed it!" Brown was not to be changed. I promised to give Harry money, declared I would treat him as my son, but all in vain; and then I found I was talking in the strain of my letter about the vanity of wealth. I told him that we were both of us old, and I asked him if we were not sure to die a few years?

"Certainly," he replied, with solemnity; "whenever God wills."

And then I asked him what was the worth, for the last few years of our lives, of feasting great folks who did not care for us.

Of course took care to evade the answer, and this greatly provoked my anger, which was very absurd, considering what I had come on the subject to Harry; but a man can't be perfectly consistent at all times. I abruptly took leave of Brown, puffed in a huge rage, yet comforted in the conviction that if Harry's case was beyond my mending Brown had at least heard a few words of wholesome truth.

I must say that Harry behaved admirably under the circumstances; I made him come and stay at my house. He was very silent and thoughtful; we were neither of us inclined for much talking, and when he did speak it was not about his love affair. I had not been quite myself for the last month or so, and I declared that my doctor had recommended me to travel. He readily consented to be my companion, and we began to make arrangements for our tour. But Harry, after all, was not destined to be my companion this year. Three days after my interview with Harry Brown burst into my room with a letter: he could not utter a word; he thrust the letter into my hand; it ran thus:

"DEAR HARRY,—Papa and mamma have consented to our marriage; come this evening.

"Ever yours,

"FANNY BROWN."

Harry declared it was Fanny's writing; for the moment I almost thought it was a practical London hoax. Harry did go to the Browns in the evening; Mr. and Mrs. Brown were very polite, though cold, but the marriage was agreed to.

I can safely affirm I was never more puzzled in my life than to discover the reason why the Browns had given their consent. I apologized to Brown for the warmth of my language; he was very polite, but cold, so was Mrs. Brown: their manner was just the same to Harry as to myself. Harry wished us both at the bottom of the sea. Harry generous-like, would have it that my conversation with Brown, or perhaps a second reading of the letter, had touched their hearts; but this solution was not satisfactory to me.

Harry was to sleep at my cottage that night, and we left Brown's house together. He was in excellent spirits, so was I too; but happiness at my time of life always makes me rather sedate and meditative. I observed very now and then that Harry looks into a corner, and I almost guessed upon what my feelings. "What's the joke, my boy?" I inquired at last.

"I've found out why the Browns gave in," he replied.

"Out with it, Harry," said I, impatiently.

"You will never be able to look Brown in the face without laughing."

"I don't mind if that's to be only penalty."

"Well, then, it is in my letter dictated at the Browns' there was a tremendous disturbance; they tried every method to make Fanny give me up—coaxing, persuading, threatening. Mrs. Denby, too, was brought up to the attack, and very skilful she was in the attack to the effect Fanny's youth and beauty would make it be a misalliance, and all the court and honor that would be paid her. One morning Mrs. Brown discovered that Fanny had written to me. Letters to Fanny; these she confiscated, and carefully placed under lock and key in her own particular and sacred drawer.

I felt indignant at this; but Harry, to my great surprise, only laughed.

"I've another of that day," he continued, "Fanny was by herself in the back drawing-room, when her father suddenly entered with the packet of letters in his hand, which he had taken care to remove to me herself, and also to write a note saying that our affair had come to an end. Fanny of course expostulated; and then Mr. Brown said that he had just glanced at one or two of the letters as he came down from Mrs. Brown's room, and that he had seen or read such passages as these."

I declared that Brown had no right to read the letters.

"I think perhaps he had," said Harry, bursting into a positive fit of laughter. "He declared they were precious stuff, every line of them, and he could not part with a single word. Fanny, to make up another letter, and after fumbling at it with his glasses he exclaimed that it was not worth reading."

"Why, Fanny, this is too bad! scandalous! the fellow positively asks you to run away!"

"Fanny," said I, seriously, "you never told me about this running-off scheme—you must know that I don't approve of such things."

"Fanny would not have agreed," he replied.

"Then I am surprised that you should have written such a letter."

"I am surprised, surprised too, I can assure you; she snatched the letter from her father's hand and took it to the light of the window.

"Why, Harry, this is no scrawl!" she exclaimed. 'It's not Harry's handwriting !'

"'Don't tell me!' said Mr. Brown, angrily.

"'Why, papa! it—it—it is not,' and so it though, here's the date; why it must be a letter of yours to mamma!'

"The fact is," continued Harry, who was almost choked with laughing, "Mr. Brown had been all the while criticising his own love-letters, which he had kept in the utter confusion of the moment and delivered one of the rotten from her desk instead of mine."

Fanny says she was at first somewhat puzzled by the writing, her father's hand having so greatly changed since he wrote those letters, when he was quite a young man."

Harry went on to say that Brown was overwhelmed with confusion at the mistake, and was brought for a long time to believe that he had ever written the letters, declaring, notwithstanding the evidence of the writing, that he never could have been such a fool. Mrs. Brown was equally astonished; she managed with some difficulty to call to mind that many years ago her husband had written out some old letters, burning some, and keeping others. It was evident she had preserved Mr. Brown's early letters, though she had quite forgotten having done so.

It gradually transpired that Mr. and Mrs. Brown's early attachment had been most imprudent in a pecuniary point of view, neither of them absolutely married without a penny, and had to be supported by relations for some years.

Mrs. Brown remembered many of long-buried feelings and sentiments had its effect on Mrs. Brown; in addition to that, the old arguments which had been used against Fanny were no longer available; and at last, after many entreaties, Mr. and Mrs. Brown reluctantly gave up their cherished plan of forming a grand alliance for their daughter.

Harry and Fanny were married the next day. Mrs. Brown wept immensely; every body said it was so natural, a mother losing her daughter. Mr. Brown declared "it was the happiest day of his life," but he looked most grievously solemn.

A SOLDIER'S DIARY.

MR. EDITOR,—I send you a bit of veritable history—a leaf from a soldier's diary in the last campaign. The testimony of an eye-and-ear witness, the personal record and experience of one man is always valuable. But every man in the army has his diary or report to give. Collect a hundred thousand such reports, and you have the history of a campaign. Not the dry official report of the general or corps commander, but even the flaming theatrical descriptions of "our correspondent." Here, as nothing was done for glory, so nothing is written for effect. In the various incidents of a soldier's life, told naturally as they fell out, are forever linked with the brightest and the darkest page in a nation's history.

To the writer, of course, and to his family and friends, not to the great public, such a record is of great value. To us, for the present, it cannot be an heir-loom to future generations. And to himself it contains a cherished memento of dear-bought experience. As he has taken on spot is a wonderful refresher of memory. The time from the writing day to day of what he did and where he was brings up a host of incidents, a thousand associations, just as the items of a business man's experience lay open at a glance his whole plan and economy of life. All common men in the midst of great actions are poets, and write poetically; that is, truthfully. A bold stroke or two will express how much the writing may be, paints the image to the mental eye, and gives the scenery of war and battle. And as the scene changes and changes and unrolls itself to the gaze of the actor and spectator, he is made a participant in all the fortunes of the fight, in all the agonies of the battle-field, while the glory or disgrace of the action is keenly felt as his own. In after-life he lives over again in memory the battles through which he has passed, and how he fought all day and marched all night in one of those flank movements which his General was so famed for executing. He remembers that in such an action or skirmish a bullet ticked him, and a comrade was either wounded or killed; that on such a night he worked in the trenches all night, or was detailed as picket-guard; and that another time he lay with his regiment in line of battle under a broiling sun, and gave way to keep clear of rebel bullets and shells falling thick about him. He is fond of telling over his anecdotes—how he "marvelous accidents" by flood and field, and his particular "peril" in the "imminent deadly breach." In short, the whole life of writing and reading is in his private soldier, consists in putting the greatest quantity of life and action into the fewest possible words.

April 13.—Pleasant morning.—Left for our regiment at 8 o'clock; reached camp at 10 o'clock; took the cars, got to our regiment at Rappahannock station at 5 P.M.

April 17.—Sunday.—Cloudy, cold morning.—Worked all day building a fire-place. Rained in the afternoon. Heavy fall of snow on the mountains.

April 18.—Rainy morning.—Finished our house and moved into it—four of us—all together.

April 19.—Pleasant morning.—Inspection.—The regiment presented Colonel Woodard with a splendid horse, saddle, bridle, &c., &c.—Weather warm.

May 4.—Started for the front.—Marched across the Rapidan at 1 o'clock.—Stopped and got breakfast.—Marched to the front and camped for the night.

May 5.—Marched all night.—Battle.—Marched into the woods and laid down.—Four companies went out skirmishing.—Left at 6 P.M.—Stopped in line of battle. 12 o'clock, changed the rebel lines.—Lost 4 good many boys.—Colonel Woodard wounded.

May 6.—Started at 4 o'clock; marched out two miles to the rebel lines, formed in line of battle, and laid down.—Laid all day; shells passed over us pretty thick.—Rebs fired on us from their breast-works.—Whizzers by our breast-works.

May 7.—Just a sunrise the rebs made a charge on our centre, but we drove them back; sharp-shooters firing at us, but we lay close to the ground and they can't hit us much.—Were shelled as well as all day.—Left at 9 o'clock to relieve the 5th corps.

May 8.—Marched all night down through Spottsylvania. Rebs were close on our rear, skirmishing with our rear guard; the rebs, got drove back.—Ross very heavy.—Rested.—Ordered out to the front.—Marched all night.—Rebs picked off night.

May 9.—Pleasant morning.—Started early, marched out, formed a line of battle.—Laid down.—Laid all day in the hot sun, very much fatigued.—Got orders to take a little before night, drove them back, then laid down and slept.

May 10.—Pleasant morning.—The battle commenced some time before daylight.—Our regiment was passed to the front to support the skirmishers.—Staid there until dark; then fell back to the breast-works.

May 11.—Cloudy, looks like rain.—Skirmish firing commenced early in the morning.—Rained hard at 10 o'clock, moved back into the woods, and stopped.—Laid down.—Rained all night.—Very disagreeable.—Rained nearly all night.

May 12.—Started at daylight, marched one mile, stopped and wrote a letter home at 11 o'clock.—Built a line of breast-works.—Rained hard.—Laid—yay to rain and laid down.—Called up at 10 o'clock, and marched all night in the rain.

May 14.—Stopped at 5 o'clock, made our coffee, and ate our breakfast.—Rained all day and all night; rather cold a good deal.—Drew three days' rations.—A good deal of fighting through the day.—Rebs repulsed.

May 17.—Cloudy.—All quiet along the lines this morning.—Sick leaving.—Looking for fighting.

May 18.—Warm morning.—The battle opened at sunrise; very heavy firing.—Rebs repulsed all the forenoon.—Got letters from home.—sent a letter home.—Threatening rain.—Got my pocket—rained in the night.

May 19.—Cloudy.—All quiet on the line.—Our boys have been fighting on the right.—Rained hard.—Wrote a letter home.—Relieved from picket at 9 o'clock: laid behind the breast-works.

May 23.—Cloudy and cool.—All quiet this morning.—We're in the rebel's country.—Expecting to move forward.—Marched nine miles, forded the North Anna River at 2 o'clock.—Stopped and got supper at 9 o'clock.—Rested an hour and a half; whipped them.

May 24.—Rainy morning.—Started at sunrise, marched 10 miles, crossed the Pamunky River, and formed a line of battle; threw up breast-works.

June 3.—Rainy morning.—The battle opened at sunrise.—Continued heavy all day.—Charged at 7 o'clock in the evening; rained all the time.—I was on the skirmish line for 10 HOURS.—Rained all night.—Laid in all second out.

June 6.—Cloudy, but warm. Stopped at 6 o'clock near Cold Harbor.—Rained hard after.—Washed, got a letter from home; ordered to pack up and go on picket at evening.—Got a good nights sleep.

June 7.—Cool and cloudy.—The boys go in swimming in the mill-pond.—Went out on picket at 5 o'clock; relieved at sundown.—Marched five miles and forwarded for the night.

That will do for the present. The notes have a sameness, like the duties which the soldier has to perform. But they give some idea of a campaign which the boys commonly describe as "forty days under fire." O ye civilians and pen-and-ink generals, who manage the war at home and sketch imaginary campaigns over cigars and wine and the daily papers, while you speculate on the rising glory of the country, and the great names of the war, never forget the poor private soldier, nor despise these "short and simple annals" of his existence!

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE IRISHMAN IN SCOTLAND.—Sir, there is a river that requires milk an' sugar before ye'd drink a dhrop of it. I wish to the Divil I was in the river Clyde.

EXPLOSION AT ROME.—It is our painful duty to record a terrific explosion which has occurred at the Vatican. The accident arose from want of caution on the part of the Pope and the College of Cardinals in neglecting a fulminating compound which has been for some time engaged in preparing for the demolition of all modern ideas. Assault before the Reformation maintain hot left their hands it blew up with a noise which was heard all over Europe, and scarcely leaves the venerable edifice in which they were assembled about their ears.

THE LAST NOVELTY IN ARCHDUKES.—One of our most eminent swindlers has just purchased a successful operation on a gentleman who had a lady in his eye.

A LITERARY MEAL.—One fault leads to many, but an author's only chance of avoiding errors is to have slips.

VERY NATURAL.—Speaking of the imaginative nature of woman, a certain writer says: "The only time a woman does not exaggerate is when she's talking of her own age."

THE PRE-ADAMITE PERIOD.—Lizard Point to the Isle of Man.

TWO IN ONE.—A servant girl, who is often "the maid and the magpie" as well.

AN APPROPRIATE TOAST.—At an election dinner at Kidderminster a glass celebrated for its manufacture of carpets—this toast was proposed by a Tory: "May the trade of our town always be trodden under foot."

OVER FOR JACK.—Why should the capture of Fort Fisher be credited to the navy?—Because it was taken by a salt assault).

A young lady was told by a married lady that she had better not marry a certain man. "Because Fulls into the basin beneath than marry. The young lady replied, "I should, if I thought I could find a husband at the bottom."

PAT, what's the best way of traveling?—Troth, sure, an' I think it is by railroad—pratties!

CHEMICAL ANALYSIS.—A Scotch lad, on a market-day in Kilmarnock, went into a tavern with a friend, and ordered some whisky. The landlord put down the bottle and measure, asked if they wished to have water along with the spirits. "Na, na," said the lad; "what ye're better try to tak' out the water that's in't already?"

It was proposed to tax ladies corsets, but it was objected to, on the ground that such a tax would diminish consumption.

Old Rowe kept a hotel, where, as he used to say, you could get a good dinner if you were ready to eat. One day came a Yankee, and stepping up to the bar, asked old Rowe what he could give him for dinner. "Anything, Sir," said old Rowe, "any thing, from a pickled elephant to a saucy fly's tongue." "Well," said the Yankee, laying Rowe, "we guess I'll take a piece of pickled elephant." "Well, my friend," said Rowe, "I have been in the house, but you'll have to take a whole 'un, 'cause we never cut 'em." The Yankee "thought he would take some codfish and potatoes."

It is well known that the philosopher Thales believed water to be the first principle.' Query: Was Thales a milkman?

Don't sleep with your coat on, or in lap and yours will be taken together.

A SPIRITUAL JOKE.—A captain of a militia company, entering a tavern, called for refreshment in the form of whisky in the possession of one of his men, a night or two ago, and when questioned the fluid. He placed it to his lips, and went out to invite some of his brother officers to partake of the spiritual beverage. Returning with a tumbler-strap friends, who smacked their lips in anticipation of the treat, the soldier was not present in the company, and the health of the gallant Captain C—— was proposed. The landlord was then asked for the bill, when he reported the fluid from his mouth, and exclaimed, "By thunder, some one has been drinking my whisky for water!" There was a laugh among the privates, but the captain did not join in it.

PARENTHESIS IN PRAYER.—A pastor of a small congregation of dissenters in the west of Scotland, who in prayer often expressed his humble gratitude to the Great Being whom he invoked, was addressing his petition in the second year, apparently in the usual manner, that the good grain such weather as was necessary for ripening and gathering in the fruits of the earth; when, quite unexpectedly, he added, "But what need I talk? when I was up at the thatch the other day and saw a thing that would astonish you—a cow eating corn!"

A DOCTOR'S PETITION.—Doctor I. Latsome wrote the following epigram for his own tombstone; but it is not likely that he allowed his friends, or at least his patients, to read it till he was under the turf, or out of practice:

When people's ill they comes to I;
I physics, bleeds, and blisters;
Sometimes they lives, sometimes they die;
But What's the good of Visitors?

ARTEMUS'S PERSCRUTION.—An Irishman called in great haste upon Dr. Abernethy, stating that, "Be Jabers, my boy Tim has swallowed a bullet, and I'm afeard he'll die." Abernethy: "Pill your boy Tim to swallow a cat."

A SPANISH watchmaker, we learn from a contemporary, has recently constructed a watch that only requires winding up once a year. The great simplicity and precision of this clock companies (limited) would be very glad to get hold of the watch, as their worke don't run as long as that in most instances.

A DOCTOR'S REASON.—A practitioner being asked by his patients why he had put such large ingredients into his prescriptions, said to have answered, more facetiously than philosophically, "in order that the disease may take which it likes best."

"CESE, what do you think is the reason that the sun rises toward the east in the winter?" "Well, I don't know, massa, unless he no stand the 'clemency of de Nort, and so am obliged to go to the South, where he 'perience warmer longitude."

A wag seeing a lady at a party with a very low-necked dress and bare arms, expressed his admiration by saying she "understripped" the whole party.

A STRANGE FACT.—That people of "loose" habits should be so often "tight."

MEDICAL.—We know several fiddlers who are now suffering from skittish coughs!

GENERAL ADELBERT AMES.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL ADELBERT AMES is a native of Maine. He entered the Academy at West Point in 1858, and was commissioned, May, 1861, Second Lieutenant, Second United States Artillery. He was immediately afterward promoted to First Lieutenant of the Fifth Artillery. He participated in the siege of Yorktown in the Peninsula campaign, and for distinguished services rendered on that occasion was brevetted Captain in the Regular Army. For other meritorious services in the battles of Malvern Hill and Garnett's Farm he was brevetted Major July 1, 1862.

In August he was commissioned Colonel of the Twentieth Maine, and in the subsequent campaign of the Army of the Potomac won considerable reputation as an officer. He was commissioned Brigadier-General May 20, 1863. During General GRANT'S Virginia campaign General AMES has commanded, first the Third Division of the Tenth Corps, and afterward the Second. When the Tenth and Eighteenth Corps were reorganized he was placed in command of the Third Division of the Twenty-fourth. General AMES'S Division was prominently engaged in the assault on Fort Fisher.

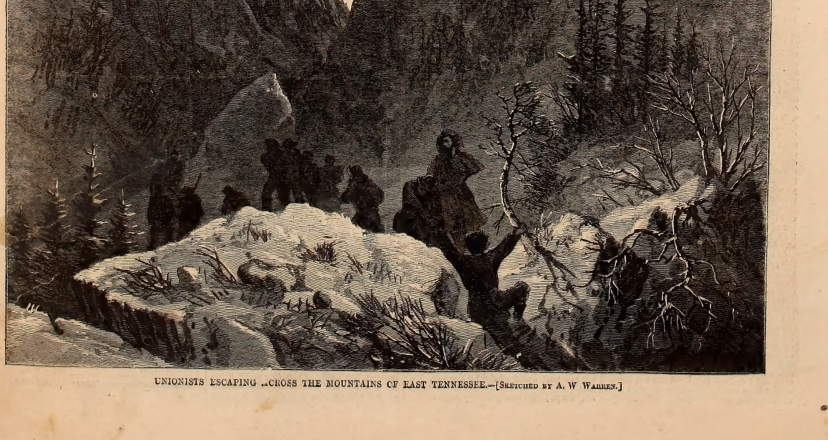
DESTRUCTION OF THE REBEL RAM "SAVANNAH."

THE rebel ram Savannah was blown up by the enemy on the night of our occupation of Savannah. The sketch from which we have engraved an illustration of the scene was taken by Captain BARCLAY, of the Signal Corps. Captain BARCLAY describes the scene as having been one of uncommon grandeur. The vessel was fired by the rebel crew just before leaving her. She burned for some time before the fire was communicated to her magazine, when she blew up. The shock was very perceptible in the city and for many miles around. She is not, however, so complete a wreck as the rebels designed to make her.

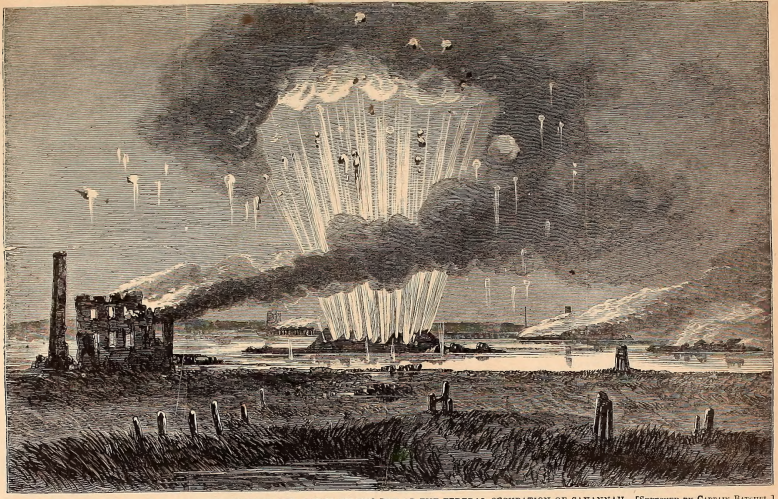
GENERAL A. H. TERRY.

MAJOR-GENERAL A. H. TERRY, commanding the military division of the expedition against Fort Fisher, is a native of Connecticut, not more than thirty-five years of age. He was a lawyer by profession, but devoted considerable attention to military matters. He commanded one of the best militia regiments of Hartford. He answered the first call for men in this war, his regiment, the Second Connecticut, being among the first in the field. He took part in the first battle of Bull Run under KEYES of TYLER'S Division. The Second Connecticut was enlisted for three months, and at the expiration of its term of service TERRY took command of the Seventh Connecticut, which belonged to the command of General T. W. SHERMAN in the expedition against Port Royal. TERRY was prominent in the siege operations on Tybee Island, which resulted in the capture of Fort Pulaski. For distinguished services on this occasion he received the appointment of Brigadier-General, to date from April 25, 1862. He led a brigade of the Tenth Corps in the battle of Pocotaligo, South Carolina, in October, 1862, and subsequently, under General GILLMORE, served in the capture of Morris Island, at the siege of Charleston. The Tenth Corps, in which he commanded the First Division, was subsequently transferred to the James; and when GILLMORE was relieved of command, TERRY succeeded him, though he afterward yielded to the more pressing claims of the late General BURNEY. His conduct in the rebel assault on the Darbytown road last summer saved the corps from a serious reverse. After BURNEY'S death the Tenth and Eighteenth corps were consolidated, forming the Twenty-fourth, and the command of the First Division was assigned to General TERRY. General TERRY was not in the first expedition against Fort Fisher, which failed. But he commanded in the second, which succeeded, and will always be connected with the glorious event of Jan. 15, 1865, whatever laurels he may hereafter win.



CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTER FROM WASHINGTON.



THE Old World can not boast of a more glorious capitol than that owned by the freemen of the United States. The rotunda is a fit shrine for those old Revolutionary paintings by the Revolutionary hero, TRUMBULL. The dome, rising in beautiful symmetry, is the beacon of liberty to the country, lifted up so high that the freedom-born shaft of Bunker Hill might be placed within it, with many feet to spare above its summit. Within the same marble edifice sit almost enthroned the legislators of our country in the most elegant of chambers. One would conceive that there were architectural attractions enough here to bring all our patres conscripti to their seats at the hour of recès. But too frequently do the Speaker and Vice-President call their respective bodies to order at this hour without a quorum. Yet why should not lassitude prevent men from attending to their duties who load the desks before them with the boots which are defacing the nation's furniture? But the expiring Thirty-eighth Congress has its SCHENCK, COLFAX, CLARKE, FOOT, COLLAMER, GRIMES, STEVENS, and the WASHBURNES, to whom the nation is indebted for a faithful and earnest discharge of their duties.

A visit to the national capitol is incomplete without a look around the Congressional Library. For while the library of Yale College contains less than fifty thousand volumes, the capitol library contains over sixty thousand. Yet the arrangement is so compact and nice that a guess would probably come far short of the proper figure. The books are all arranged according to their subjects. This was done by THOMAS JEFFERSON after the Baconian system. To the three grand divisions of mental activity, MEMORY, reason, imagination, correspond respectively history, philosophy, and the fine arts. Each of these grand divisions is divided and subdivided. For instance, history is divided into the civil and natural departments, and so forth. Newspapers are classified under the department of civil history. Our curiosity prompted us to go behind the scenes, and examine how great a museum of American newspapers is on file in our nation's library. Alas! out of the very few we do not recollect any not complete from their origin. But the London Times is here in ponderous tomes complete from its foundation. The suggestion was forcibly brought home to us that the United States are rich enough in the style and character of their newspaper press to have files of the principal papers throughout the land carefully kept in the capitol library. Did only the votaries of the press derive benefit therefrom, that profession is large enough to have its "reports" carefully treasured up here.

Upon the locus o non locendo principle the "Baltimore Dépôt" deserves a passing reflection. Were a backman to oblige his passengers to alight in a mud-puddle he would do something similar to the

UNIONISTS ESCAPING ACROSS THE MOUNTAINS OF EAST TENNESSEE.—[SKETCHED BY A. W WARREN.]

Railway Company that lands its passengers in the so-called "Baltimore Depôt." In respect to appearance it might do for a City Point where the soldier does not care for looks. But in respect to convenience any quarter-master would return it as unfit for service. But we are giving too many words to such an affair, yet the American visiting his own capital must feel that the spot where he first sets foot on the consecrated ground of his nation should not suffer in comparison with the elegant stations at the capitals of France and England. The laws of association suggest to the traveler the hotel together with the depôt, yet for another reason they might be thought of at the same time. For hotel life in Washington is a bar-room life emphatically. There has been too great a delicacy among writers in criticising the public-house habits at the capital. The following, taken from a daily paper, shows how respectable such life is made, and where the reform must begin: "Senator ——, of ——, had a bar-room fight in Washington Thursday, and was knocked down by his opponent." Neal Dows and John B. Goughs are not so much needed to effect a reform as a higher tone of popular feeling respecting such things at the capital. Barnum may laugh at the Washington Monument as the humbug of Washington; but there is a moral slough in this city more shameful than this lump of an unfinished Washington Monument, and darker and fouler than the natural one from which the elder Adams embalmed the pride of the country—Pennsylvania Avenue.

But let us change the atmosphere, and, crossing the Potomac on the Aqueduct Bridge, enjoy this beautiful winter's prospect of the capital from Arlington Heights. We get a fine view from the piazza, or the cupola of the house, left alone and an untenanted possession of the Government. As we walked through that grand oak forest an army of crows were on the their Billingsgate to him whose late home crowns the eminence. A graveyard about the Custis Mansion are occupied as a graveyard for Union soldiers, while in the house itself is the head-quarters of the captain superintending.

We pass by Forts Albany, Corcoran, and others, crowning these heights with their high flags afloat, and, as a more interesting and instructive object, elevate our tone to "Freedman's Village," a colony of eighteen hundred liberated slaves. It is under the control of Government, and a sentinel takes your "pass," to scarcely enter before you perceive in their countenances of joy that both old and young appreciate the opportunities they have here for getting an education and learning the arts of civilization. Here we see the deserted Lee Mansion and the happy Freedman's Village side by side. . . . Which are the neatest? Which the master and freedman have exchanged places. "What God hath wrought!" is the message which now comes over the Potomac from Arlington Heights.

Mr. H. E. Simmons, of Rhode Island, superintends the schools here. He is assisted by half a dozen male and female assistants, and a casual call at the school convinces one that the children of Mam can become fearful scholars. But Freedman's Village is another and quite as powerful teacher in that well-known lecturers—Southern Truths. We found this unseen laborer for the slave in one of the little cottages, her hands in the flour. We congratulated her upon the rescue of this fragment, like that of the Israelites from the land of Egyptian darkness. But Sojourner replied with energy that this was only a "large Government poorhouse." She would "her folks to be learning habits of economy, to be earning something, to become real Yankees." We bought one of Sojourner's pictures, and she desired our autograph in the memorandum-book, in which a few days before had been inscribed, "For Aunty Sojourner Truth. A Lincoln." Some bore-cox days labeled "Colored persons not admitted" collect fares from far less sensible ones than honest, earnest, and God-worshipping Sojourner Truth.

Washington, January, 1865. C. P. O.

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH CABLE.

The new Atlantic Telegraph Cable is in rapid progress at the works of the Telegraph Construction and Maintenance Company, formerly Glass & Elliott's, at East Greenwich. This work, if successfully completed, will be the triumph of the century; and to the accomplishment of this end the engineers and the electrician are exhausting their combined energies. It is not chiefly the powerful machinery by which fourteen miles of the "core," or gutta-percha coated copper wire, are worked up into cable every day that excites our astonishment, but the more minute and complex operations—those, for instance, by which tons of material during the manufacture must undergo the trial of those exquisite instruments over which the man of science bends watchfully hour after hour, ready not only to detect a fault, but to apprise the engineers at what exact distance in the cable it has occurred.

The core of the cable is fabricated from iron wire and Manila yarn, which is afterward steeped in a seething compound of tar and gutta-percha, a section of which model cable measures an inch and one-eighth in diameter, the seven conducting wires lying close together in the middle. These wires are surrounded by layers of gutta-percha. This is then covered with an additional protection consisting of ten closely-twisted strands, having iron wire in the center. Only forty tons of this iron wire are used every week in combination with Manila at the rate of six and a half tons per day. The wire is twisted around by machinery from bobbins, the machine each turning out 140 miles of the Manila-covered wire in a day. As it is twisted it goes through the hot solution of tar and gutta-percha above mentioned, when it is passed through a trough of water to cool it. The motive of the machinery is the factory where this process goes on is absolutely deafening. It should be observed that before being worked into the core by the ten strands of wire and yarn the core is wrapped in a twisted fold of jute.

From the gutta-percha works the cable is then carried to Morden Wharf factory. Here the core is received on large reels, and is sunk in circular openings, which are then filled up with water. From first to last, we may here observe, the cable is in all its processes of formation at this factory kept in water, that any flaw in the coating may the more quickly be made apparent. For twelve hours the coils of core are subject to electrical tests, their continuity being ascertained and their complete insulation proved beyond doubt. The joining of the ends is a very delicate operation, and in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred if any fault is detected it is found in one of the joints. Hitherto the superintendents of this anxious work have been very fortunate; but it has sometimes happened that a great length of cable has had to be uncoiled, the defective joint cut out, and the whole made good. An account is kept of the daily progress, and there were six hundred and twenty-nine miles completed December 16, 1864. More than twelve miles are added daily, so that now there are over a thousand miles completed. The distance from the west coast of Ireland to Trinity Bay, Newfoundland, is one thousand six hundred and forty nautical miles. Two of the eight tanks are nearly full, and will soon be ready for embarkation by the Agamemnon and Iris, ready for embarking hulks which lie alongside, near the wharf. The decks of these vessels have been knocked about considerably, and they must get out and of, to make room for tanks in which the cable will be stowed in the same manner as at the factory. The hulks, which will be towed to the North Norway, where the Great Eastern is now lying, with three enormous tanks on board, occupying, by comparison with the smaller vessels, a little space as to deceive experienced eyes as to their actual dimensions. The Iris and the Agamemnon have each two tanks on board. The Iris will make nine trips to get all the cable...longside the "big ship."

Mr. Canning and Mr. Clifford, under whose control the operations have been conducted at East Greenwich, will accompany their precious charge on board the Great Eastern, and will direct the laying of the cable across the Atlantic Ocean. Our statement of the mileage of perfected cable given but little idea of the length of the sheet destined to be taken upward. For example, to make up the 2300 miles of cable which, allowing for various contingencies, will be required, 11,000 miles of copper wire are used. The insulating material is equal to an aggregate length of 18,400 miles; the jute, being in ten strands, will contain 23,000 miles, which will also be the length of the iron wire; and as each wire is separately covered with five twists or strands of yarn, 115,000 miles of the latter will be worked into the cable, making together a length of material which amounts to 215,800 miles. What these figures mean will be apparent to every reader by reference to the astronomical fact that the distance of 237,000 miles is that from the earth to the moon.

PETROLEUM.

The New York and Liverpool Petroleum Company, whose advertisement appears elsewhere, offers unrivaled guarantees of safety and good management in the fact that it is so largely owned and conducted by real men of oil—not mere speculators in corporations. Mr. Anger, one of its trustees, belongs to the Titusville firm of Reeder, Watson, & Co., whose wealth counts by millions. Mr. Myers, another, is an extensive well-proprietor and oil-shipper; and others of them, so to speak, "live and move and have their being" in oil. Such features show that a company is real, and meant for permanence.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

TWELVE YEARS AGO

Hostetter's Stomach Bitters was struggling into notice—struggling as those which every thing now however excellent, is doomed to encounter:

it stands at the head of all the tonic and alterative preparations in existence. Its celebrity has evoked many imitations, but we warn the public against them: it is the only SAFE REMEDY that has ever been introduced into the United States, in the Hospital and Army and Navy of the surgeons find it the very best tonic for convalescents, and prove it to be unsurpassed as a remedy for the debility on the march, as a remedy for scurvy and all scorbutic affections, and as the only specific for intermittent. California and Australia have emphatically indorsed it as the Monarch of Medicines, and throughout all South America and all the tropical climates it is considered the only reliable remedy to eradicate fevers.

There is no mystery about the causes of its success. It is of the purest vegetable and spirituous ingredients, and the grand requisites of a mild, pure, and unvitiated vegetable stimulant, with the finest alterative, tonic, diuretic, antiscorbutic, aperient, and depurative herbs, plants, roots, barks, and flowers, are combined with it in a medicinal preparation.

As the Bitters have this distinctive quality, which is not shared, it is believed, by any tonic, tincture, or extract in the world, they do not stimulate like alcoholics, but infuse a wonderful degree of vigor into the nervous system, and strengthen and sustain the whole physical organization.—New York Tribune.

LOCK GOLD PENS WITHOUT CASES.

For 50 cents, the Magic Pen; for 75 cents, the Lucky Pen; for $1 00, the Always-Ready Pen; for $1 25, the Excelsior Pen; and for $1 50, the Eureka Pen. These Pens are not numbered, but correspond in sizes to Numbers 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 Pens, as below.

THE SAME PENS IN SILVER-PLATED EXTENSION CASES.

For $1 00, the Magic Pen; for $1 25, the Lucky Pen; for $1 50, the Always-Ready Pen; for $1 75, the Excelsior Pen; and for $2 25, the Excelsior Pen.

These are No. 1 Holders, Good-Writing Gold Pens, with Iridomin Points, the average wear of every one of which will far outlast a gross of the best Steel Pens; although they are unwarranted, and, therefore, not exchangeable.

MORTON'S WARRANTED PENS.

The name, A. Morton, "Number," and "Quality," are stamped on the following Pens, and the points are warranted for six months, except against accident.

The Numbers indicate size only; No. 1 being the smallest, and No. 6 the largest Gold pen for pocket; No. 4 the smallest, and No. 10 the largest Mammoth Gold Pen, for the desk.

Long and Medium Nibs of all sizes and qualities. Short Nibs of Nos. 4, 5, 6, 8, and 10, and made only of first quality.

The Long and Short Nibs are fine pointed; the Medium Nibs, fine, medium, and coarse points. The engravings are fac-similes of the sizes and styles.

GOLD PENS WITHOUT CASES.

For $1 25 a No. 1 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 3 Pen, 2d quality.

For $1 50 a No. 2 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 3 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 4 Pen, 3d quality.

For $1 75 a No. 3 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 4 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 5 Pen, 3d quality.

For $2 00 a No. 4 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 5 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 6 Pen, 3d quality.

For $2 25 a No. 5 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 6 Pen, 2d quality.

For $2 50 a No. 6 Pen; $4 50 a No. 7 Pen; $6 75 a No. 8 Pen; $9 50 a No. 9 Pen; $7 50 a No. 10 Pen—all 1st quality.

THE SAME GOLD PENS, IN SILVER EXTENSION CASES.

GOLD PENS, WITH QUALITY, IN SILVER, MOUNTED DESK-HOLDERS.

For $2 75 a No. 4 Pen; for $3 25 a No. 5 Pen; for $4 00 a No. 6 Pen; for $5 a No. 7 Pen.

For $7 a No. 8 Pen; for $8 a No. 9 Pen; and for $9 a No. 10 Pen.

The "1st Quality" are pointed with the very best Iridomin Points, regardless of size, and none of this quality are sold with the slightest imperfection which skill and the closest scrutiny can detect.

The "2d Quality" are superior to any Pens made by the previous to the year 1859.

The "3d Quality" he intends shall equal in respect to Durability, Elasticity, and Good Writing Qualities (the only true consideration) any Gold Pens made elsewhere.

In regard to the Iridomin Points, he begs leave to say that previous to opening his New and Patented Machines, he could not have produced Gold Writing Quills and Pens, for the Price, had the Gold been furnished gratuitously.

Parties ordering must in all instances specify the Number of the Pen wanted, and the "Quality" of the Pen wanted, and be particular to describe the kind they prefer—whether stiff or limber, coarse or fine.

All remittances sent by mail in registered letters are at my risk, and to all who send twenty cents (charge for registering), in addition to the price of goods ordered, I will guarantee their safe delivery.

Parties sending Gold or Silver will be allowed the full premium on the day received.

TO CLUBS.—A discount of 10 per cent. will be allowed on cash of $10 or $25; per cent. on $50, and of 50 per cent. on $40, if sent to one address at one time.

Every One is Reading General Scott's Autobiography!!

Every One is Talking about General Scott's Autobiography!!!

It throws more light upon the obscure parts of "American History" than any book published for years.

It exhibits the rampant treason of "Buchanan's Cabinet," and depicts the fearful peril in which our Government was before Mr. Lincoln was inaugurated.

It gives the secret history of the dreadful struggle with Treason in every part of the Southern States before it broke out into open rebellion.

9 vols., 12mo. Illustrated. Price, per set, $4.
Sent by mail on receipt of the price.

"To the student of American History this work is invaluable, being written by so distinguished and prominent an actor in the life of the Republic—one who was already distinguished in the Mexican campaign, and a contemporary of the great men who gave it a place in the world of nations."—Philadelphia Legal Intelligencer.

"To review this book is impossible; every line should be read, every page carefully considered."—City Item (Philadelphia).

"The history of no living American is invested with any thing like the degree of interest and national pride as that given to its readers in this autobiography."—Toledo Blade.

"The most interesting biography ever written in this country."—New York Leader.

"We call the attention of young men to the record of the life of this great man."—New York Observer.

"General Scott has made a contribution of singular value and interest to American history—a contribution which it would be difficult to match, not only in our own but in any nation's literature."—Union (Brooklyn).

"To the last day of its existence the country will have reason to regret that General Scott was not permitted to manage affairs during the time when secession first began to show that it was a vital thing. * * * Such will be the verdict of history, in whose pages Scott will stand in the highest point."—Boston Traveller.

"The General tells his story in a manly, modest, and winning way, and every reader will be charmed with the charm of the style and the frankness of the author."—Saturday Evening Express (Boston).

"No patriot can afford to be without them; no student of American history will be without them."—Press (Portland).

In consequence of the great stagnation of trade in the manufacturing districts of New England, through not having cut off the supply of cotton, a large quantity of valuable Jewelry, originally intended for the English market, has been sent off for sale in this country, and MUST BE SOLD AT ANY SACRIFICE!

Under these circumstances, ARRANDALE & CO., acting as Agents for the Trade, and Liverpool Manufacturers, have so resolved upon a Great Gift Distribution, subject to the following conditions:

CERTIFICATES, naming each article and its value, are placed in a Envelope, and well mixed. One of these envelopes will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of 25 cents.

ALL ARTICLES SOLD AT ONE DOLLAR EACH, WITHOUT REGARD TO VALUE!!

On receipt of a certificate you will see what you are going to have, and then it is at your option to send the dollar and take the article named. Purchasers may thus obtain a Gold Watch, Diamond Ring, or any Set of Jewelry on our list for One Dollar, and in no case can they get less than One Dollar's worth, as there are no blanks. The distribution of prizes is as follows:

One for 25 cents; five for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10; one hundred for $15.

Agents will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered by them, and their remittances amounting to One Dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps.

THE NATIONAL REVOLVER.

This new celebrated Pistol is the most compact, powerful, and effective Pocket Revolver in the world. It carries the large ball for the size of the Pistol of any Revolver made. EXTREME LENGTH, 7 INCHES; WEIGHT, 14 OZS.; Is fired from the hand.

Its Advantages are:

1st. It is loaded with perfect ease and safety, without removing the cylinder for any part of it, at the fore end, and can be carried when loaded within the tightest dresses.

2d. The cylinder never leaks; is made from solid steel, bored; and can not get out of repair, or the cylinder waste of many parts will do.

3d. The cartridge is made on an improved plan; the fulminate is concentrated in one place, which insures sure fire. IS MECHANICAL, CERTAIN OF FIRE, AND WORTH PRICE.

4th. Its peculiar model makes it the most desirable Pocket Revolver ever made.

FOR SALE BY THE TRADE GENERALLY.

GEO. A. HICKCOX, 54 Cliff Street, New York.

Certificates.

I have thoroughly tested the merits of "National Revolver," and find it an effective weapon, of sure fire and convenient size. At fifty paces, I think I could with it hit Five Ball at every shot. I take pleasure in recommending it as a weapon in every way desirable. To company with Capt. Stott, Provost-Marshal, and other officers, I fired this pistol a large number of times, and not one cartridge failed to explode. (Signed,) JOHN CHARLESTON,
Chief of Police, Cairo, Ill.

We have one of the "National Revolver" now in use. It commences in one of the worst settings of the kind we ever saw. It is simple in construction, substantial, sure fire, and shoots with the force and accuracy of a rifle. Any one in want of a good and reliable weapon can not do better than procure a "National Revolver."
(Signed,) J. S. VINCENT,
Editor and Proprietor of "New Era."

We, the undersigned, having used and thoroughly tested the National Revolvers, have no hesitancy in saying that, for accuracy, force, and convenience, we think they are far superior to any other Revolver yet produced.

OPINIONS OF THE ENGLISH PRESS.

Saturday Review.

A healthier novel we have not seen for many a season. To have depicted such a character as Mattie Gray, and to have depicted it successfully, is no slight achievement either ethical or esthetical.

Athenæum.

"Mattie: a Stray," is a novel that ought to take a higher rank than that of an ephemeral work of fiction. Mattie is a charming heroine. She and her life are painted after the life. The story is full of interest from page to page.

There is great ability in this book.

ARMSTRONG GUN.

IN Fort Fisher our army found a splendid 150-pound Armstrong Gun, weighing 15,739 pounds. Upon it was this inscription: "Sir W. C. Armstrong & Co., Newcastle-upon-Tyne. No. 19." This was quite evidently a present to the rebels from some prominent British gentleman, if not from the inventor himself. Great care had been taken of it, and General WARREN gave especial orders that it was not to be fired except under the pressure of necessity. It had the appearance of having been recently mounted. The gun is bronzed, and mounted on a mahogany carriage highly varnished. The whole piece is finished in the finest style. It was fired a very few times during the action. During the confusion attending the occupation of the works by the Union troops some mischievous person stole the sights. The Armstrong guns are manufactured exclusively under the auspices of the British Government, and Admiral PORTER, in his official report, states this fact as if it were a conclusive proof that the British Government, or some one high in authority, had presented the gun to the Confederate Government.

150-POUND ARMSTRONG GUN CAPTURED AT FORT FISHER.—[SKETCHED BY CHARLES F. ELLMORE.]

BEFORE PETERSBURG.

THE great military event of the week was the attempt made by the rebel iron-clads on the James to descend the river past our obstructions on the night of January 23. Hints had been given out that General LEE was about to do something that would astonish the world. The design of this iron-clad raid was as bold against us as it was perilous to the vessels engaged. The blow was mainly directed against the army on the north side of the James. The rebel fleet, after passing our obstructions, was to recapture Fort Harrison; and it is likely that a raid on City Point was also in contemplation. The object is thus stated by the Richmond Whig of January 25:

"The expedition of our iron-clads down the river had been designed to break the enemy's pontoon bridges, and thus destroy his communications, and to take advantage of the ascertained fact that he had withdrawn most of his naval force from the river, probably to Wilmington, leaving but one iron-clad and some wooden vessels in the channel above Varina. There was also reason to suppose that the recent freshet had washed out a portion of his line of obstructions." At least three iron-clads—the Richmond, Virginia, and Fredericksburg—were engaged in the raid. These were accompanied by the Drewry, a small wooden gun-boat, mounting one gun. This boat got aground, and was blown up, either by the enemy or by a shell from our batteries.—The Fredericksburg is said to have passed the obstructions successfully, but this is uncertain. At least it is doubtful whether, even if they succeeded in passing their own obstructions, they found it so easy to pass ours. The rebels only claim that one iron-clad, the Fredericksburg, succeeded in getting through. The Virginia and the Richmond got aground, but escaped at high tide. The land batteries prevented the success of this move. The remaining vessel joined them being the Curtis House Battery.

MISSING.

Boom! boom! boom!
"Twas the sullen signal-gun,
And through the early morning gloom
It pealed like the stamp of a dreadful doom;
And the tired sleeper woke with a start,
And remembered what should be his part
In the tragedy that must soon begin;
Whether the flight should lose or win,
And where he should be when the day was done.

But his reverie could not last:
"Sybil ho! fill in!" was the cry;
And with each thought of the happy past,
Due silence that was suddenly, lovingly cast
At a picture that smiled down to his heart,
A glance that made the warm tears start,
One breathing of prayer, one cheery word
To the mustering ranks, he grasped his sword
And sprang to the front to do or die.

Then a hundred cannon roared,
And a hundred bugles blared,
And over the ramparts the horses poured
With hurried flash and flashing sword;
And across the plain, where the storm of death
Came sweeping down with its fiery breath,
And up the hill, where the surly foe
Like an ambushed lion was crouching low,
They marched—but where it was death they dared.

His voice was steady and clear,
His heart was cheerful and strong;
In his face there lingered no line of fear,
The fire in his eye had dried the tear,
And cheerily rang his word of command
As he shouted back to his gallant band.
They were falling fast, but he did not quail,
And steadily up through the leaden hail,
He led his confident braves along.

Right up to the rampart grim
Where the rebel flag was floating;
Right up to the awful crater's rim
The sturdy veterans followed him.
"Forward! boys, forward!" they heard him cry;
Then a blast of death went howling by,
And when it had passed he was lying still,
And his braves were staggering down the hill,
And the air was rent with the rebel shouting.

Oh, who can tell the rest?
In he lying silently now
With the frozen clods above his breast?
Alas! God knoweth what is best;
But better, far better, our poor hearts say,
To gaze on his face in the fair fray
Than slowly to die in the loathsome cell
Of a terrible Southern prison hell!
God knoweth the best—to His will we bow.

PEACE AGAIN.

THE gentlemen who find comfort in the visits of Mr. BLAIR or of any one else to JEFFERSON DAVIS or any other rebel, must not suppose that they monopolize the wish for peace, nor that those who estimate such visits at their exact value are an extreme war party. Neither need they delude themselves with the fancy that it is a profitable thing to send secret agents to sound the sentiment of the rebel chiefs because Lord NORTH sent commissioners to ascertain the views of the Continental Congress. The effort to assimilate this rebellion to the American revolution, in whatever manner it may be made, must inevitably fail. The rebels do not appeal to the right of revolution to redress wrongs otherwise without remedy; nor plead the right of secession to be exercised at their discretion.

If this truth is borne steadily in mind it will be seen that the difficulty is one that does not admit of compromise or terms of surrender. It is a defiance of national sovereignty, based upon a different interpretation of the fundamental law. There can be but two parties: the party of the national sovereignty at all hazards, and the party of its enemies. A third party is impossible, because there can be no compromise of supreme sovereignty. It may be sacrificed, it may be reduced, but then it becomes another thing. It has ceased to be supreme. In our case it is a question of power. Is the nation supreme? Is the State supreme? Supreme and sovereignty are both words with a distinct meaning; and there can be no difficulty in seeing that one must yield to the other, and in the nature of things the yielding must be entire. The State must surrender absolutely the essential powers known as sovereign, or the nation must. There is no compromise between life and death. While the body is living in the least there is no death. The attribute of supreme sovereignty is indivisible.

Now it is easy to see that all DAVIS or any rebel can say is one of two things. He may say that he will relinquish the national sovereignty, or he may promise that he will do so provided the Government will accede to some condition he may name. He must say one of these things, or he must fight on without saying any thing. But if he says the last, he can not be listened to, and if he agrees to the first he will do so without being asked. What then is gained by incessantly knocking at his door and politely inquiring whether he has made up his mind?

If there are those who believe that the Government is beat upon war without reason and without end, they are not to be persuaded. In their view, whatever the Government does is wrong. They are like children in the sulks. If you try to pacify them by any mild contrary expedients it is equally useless. If you walk or sit, if you talk or are silent, it is all the same. It is the essence of discontent to be discontented; and human ingenuity was never yet without a plausible excuse for the wildest contradictions and absurdities. An old Cavalier would as soon have named him son Praise God or Zeal-in-the-land as an opponent of the war be appeased or satisfied with any act of the Government.

But those who see this, and who knew from the beginning what the issue of all such peace embassies must be, are not to be lightly called to extreme war party because they understand the matter better than the dabblers in hopeless projects of peace.

The words, "extreme war party," are used as a term of contempt or censure. But how are they contemptible who insist upon maintaining civil order against causeless rebellion? and why should they be censured who demand an unconditional surrender of armed rebels? If by "extreme war party" is meant those who wish for vengeance, then the term describes a very few persons, if any, that most men do not know of their existence.

For there is no wish of vengeance, but only of peace that shall endure. We have very little doubt that when the rebels have acknowledged the authority of the Government, and have assented either to emancipation or to a peaceful and legal trial of the question, they will find that the people do not favor a wholesale confiscation; that they do not clamor for the blood of the rebel leaders, but have counted more precious blood to flow than they could atone for if they bled until the end of the world; that they ask two things only, but ask them with a power not to be denied—the restoration of Liberty, without which there can be no Peace.

A SCAPE-GOAT.

THE bitter denunciation of JEFFERSON DAVIS by some of the rebel newspapers is merely a fierce cry for a scape-goat. In their enormity it is a relief to cast the responsibility of disaster upon some conspicuous person, and as DAVIS from his position must have many enemies who will immediately echo the cry, he is selected. There is no indication of any able leader among them. Indeed not one of the rebel civil chiefs has shown the least capacity. Whether the Congress is an assembly of such commonplace talent that no member is more prominent than another. Compared with other revolutionary assemblages, the Long Parliament, the Continental Congress, the French Convention, it is ludicrously weak and unimportant. On the one hand, it registers Davis's edicts, and on the other, it does not dare to expel Mr. FOOTE. It has displayed neither sagacity, eloquence, nor vigor, and will be remembered only to be despised.

Indeed, the glamour of the rebellion has faded away. There was a time when it was a kind of fashion to ascribe to its leaders qualities of the heroic and statesmanlike qualities; but the time is rapidly approaching when it will be seen that men who arbitrarily swayed others by appeals to ignorance and passion have not been entitled to be called statesmen than those who live by the unpaid labor of others and buy and sell human beings like cattle are entitled to be called gentlemen. Alexander Hamilton, especially, was contrasted as a statesman and a gentleman with ABRAHAM LINCOLN. But when the historian comes to read the political writings and speeches, full sincerity of private manner of the President, his lofty, humane faith in man, liberty, and the republic, his wise prudence and sagacious perception of the course of public sentiment and of the possibilities of action, and compares them with the cold reserve of DAVIS's personal intercourse, the specious phrases and long hostility to human rights of his official papers, and the mad scurrility of his tirades in public speech, the historian will see and declare that, in an age and among a people of unexampled virtue, the mere quibbles of a desperate effort to outwit the human instincts are as unworthy the name of statesmanship as the abject terror of MAXIMILIAN Jumbo is unworthy the name of religion. Survey the field of the rebellion, hear and read all that it has said and written, and then answer whether the greatest thought, the noblest hope, or the human race a single inspiration from all its words and deeds. The world struggling forward, through a light-hearted folly that ever cheered and stimulated by the mere effort of Greece against Persia, of the cities against the barons, of the field of Magna Charta, of the Dutch Eighty Years' War, of the German revolutions. But what generous word or thought or aim can literature cherish or art immortalize in this dreary attempt to overthrow the most equal Government in order to confirm and perpetuate a revolting injustice?

The exclamation against DAVIS is only a cry of despair. The call for LEE means no more. General LEE is a weak man and a good soldier. He is not a great or remarkable general. He gave but half a heart to the cause he fights for. He will doubtless fight for it to the end; and when the end appears he would probably wish at least to fall upon the field. But the rebellion would be no more hopeful if he were made absolute Dictator. The Rebel Congress have passed an act requiring the President to appoint a General-in-Chief. But DAVIS, of course, does not forget that whoever may be General-in-Chief he is the constitutional Commander of the General; and he reminds his faithful legree that LEE has already been in command of all the rebel armies, and would not undertake to command in the field as will-be-pleased or satisfied with any act of the Government.

But those who see this, and who knew from the beginning what the issue of all such peace embassies must be, are not to be lightly called to extreme war party because they understand the matter better than the dabblers in hopeless projects of peace.

The words, "extreme war party," are used as a term of contempt or censure. But how are they contemptible who insist upon maintaining civil order against causeless rebellion? and why should they be censured who demand an unconditional surrender of armed rebels? If by "extreme war party" is meant those who wish for vengeance, then the term describes a very few persons, if any, that most men do not know of their existence.

For there is no wish of vengeance, but only of peace that shall endure. We have very little doubt that when the rebels have acknowledged the authority of the Government, and have assented either to emancipation or to a peaceful and legal trial of the question, they will find that the people do not favor a wholesale confiscation; that they do not clamor for the blood of the rebel leaders, but have counted more precious blood to flow than they could atone for if they bled until the end of the world; that they ask two things only, but ask them with a power not to be denied—the restoration of Liberty, without which there can be no Peace.

FRANCE IN MEXICO.

THE last incident in the French conquest of Mexico will suggest to every thoughtful American that we are in a very feeble assembly and inevitably into new political complications. We do not say drifting in any offensive sense, nor to anything that we could change the course of events. While we are straining all our power to restore domestic peace, it can not be expected that we should escape the danger of foreign complications. They can not be attempted except for our disturbed condition. And those who have complained that we did not prevent a hostile footing in the Mexico whose that their pride is greater than their wisdom, and betray a curious ignorance of the actual situation. We were not in a condition to interfere, and therefore we did well not to remonstrate. We stated to France our traditional policy on the question, but we did not bluster or threaten. Those who complained that we did not can now decide, upon calm reflection, whether the resolution of Mr. HENRY WINTER DAVIS would have been a dignified or self-respecting foreign dispatch from the State Department. The Senate, by declining to adopt it, has saved the true honor of the country.

The Mexican question, although it was merely what Mr. EVERETT called "an executive declaration," and although it never received any official sanction from Congress, yet has been universally adopted as the absolutely indisputable policy of this Government toward all European governments which should endeavor to establish a foothold upon this continent. As it is popularly understood, the Monroe doctrine declares that the United States will drive every European power from our neighborhood. But if it really means that the right to independent governments upon this continent the right to ask the assistance or even the presence of European within the Monroe doctrine, then it is an absolute prohibition of our own fundamental principle of the right of the people to govern themselves.

The truth is, it does no such thing. In view of the probable design of the Holy Alliance in Europe to compel the return to Spain of some of her American colonies which had declared and maintained their independence, and had been recognized by the United States, President MONROE, in December, 1823, said that "we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them or controlling in any other manner their destiny, by any European power, if any other light than as a manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States." This can not be thought to contemplate opposition to a friendly request of assistance unless we intended to defy the international honor. In another part of the same message the President said that the American continents "are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European government."

That the cession to France of certain provinces of Mexico by the viceroy whom France maintains in the country must be considered a case of such colonization is clear. Mexican provinces regulated by French armies are virtually French colonies. But what the duty of the United States may be under the circumstances is not so evident. The situation demands the utmost sagacity and not the least swagger. There is nothing in the world easier than to strike an attitude and cry hands off. But before defying any of the Great Powers to mortal combat upon such a point it is well to calculate every chance. When OLIVER CROMWELL had thoroughly pacified England he turned his eyes abroad. But while the fields of Dunbar and Worcester were yet to fight his eyes and soul were centred there.

THE BLACK LAWS.

ILLINOIS has repealed her black laws, and indeed she could hardly help wiping the stain from her face when her neighbor Missouri was lifting her whole body out of the slough. The black laws of Illinois, although Illinois is a free State, were as much a part of the code of slavery as any slave law of Arkansas or Mississippi for they were the work of what was called the Democratic party, and that party was the minister of slavery. In Illinois, for instance, all colored persons were presumed to be slaves unless they could prove themselves to be free; in other words, were held to be guilty until they proved their innocence: thus directly reversing the test humane maxim of the common law. By another act, if any negro or mulatto came into the State and staid ten days, he was to be fined fifty dollars, and sold indefinitely to pay the fine.

We read such things incredulously, in the light of to-day. The wicked folly of selecting for outrage a special class of the population, and that class the most innocent and defenseless, is so like a caprice of Ashantee society, or a measure of Patagonian statesmanship, that it is quite impossible to believe that it was tolerated in the great, generous, and enlightened State of Illinois. It explains the curiously inhuman and heartless tone of Mr. DOUGLAS in speaking of the colored race. He lived in such a land of this senseless and fierce prejudice, and he rose by pandering to it.

The black laws of Illinois were another proof of the fearful demoralization which slavery had wrought in this country, and upon which it counted for easy success in its rebellion. When slavery saw that SEWARD and BUCHANAN, two successive Presidents, were its most abject tools; when it saw every Northern city ready to take by the throat any man who fiercely denounced it; when it saw even in Boston a mob assistant and noted citizen named FAY, with the Mayor of the city, turning a meeting for condemnation of slavery into the street; when it read such laws as those of Illinois; when it saw the city of New York cringing beneath its frown and fawning upon its contemptuous smile, how could it help believing that BENJAMIN FRANKLIN wrote the truth to JEFFERSON DAVIS when he said that the blood would flow this side of Mason and Dixon's line rather than the cotton, and sugar, with ROBERT TOOMBS, that any man could drink all the blood that would be shed in the war.

Now that Illinois has repealed her black laws, is it too much to hope that New York will do the same thing? The Constitution of the State allows colored citizens to vote, provided that they have lived so long in the State and county, and paid twice as much tax as any other voter. The other voters may be ignorant and brutal sots, who are nuisances and pests in any community, and there may be intelligent, industrious, thrifty, valuable citizens; but the Constitution of New York, enslaved by the same mean and inhuman prejudice which dictated the black laws of Illinois, declares that ignorance and brutality are politically preferable to intelligence and thrift.

If intelligence is to be the condition of active citizenship, it is a jest which every body can understand, and which most people will approve. But to make it dependent upon complexion is as wise as to rest it upon the color of the hair or the breadth of the shoulders. The monstrous subjection of this country to the prejudice against color is one of the many which are under its influence suppose, "a natural instinct;" it is only the natural result of a system which arbitrarily and forcibly makes color the sign of hopeless servitude. If red-haired men or men over six feet in height were enslaved and imbruted for centuries, there would be exactly the same "natural antipathy" to them which is now privately alleged by many otherwise sensible people against the colored race.

Missouri has emancipated herself; Illinois has thrown off her black laws. Suppose that sensible men and women now emancipate themselves from the black law of a most cruel and senseless prejudice.

OUR CANADIAN NEIGHBORS.

THE Message of the Governor-General of Canada, the debate in the Canadian Parliament, and the extradition of BURLEY, the Lake Erie raider, show that the Canadian authorities mean to enforce neutrality. It is only the truth to say that the conduct of the Canadian Government is much more friendly than that of the British. It reveals also some disposition to maintain the spirit of a true neutrality which WASHINGTON showed in 1793, and the United States Government in the case of the alleged Russian privateer in the Delaware. If the British Government had shown the same alacrity in respecting honest obligations; if it had stopped the same before Mr. ADAMS virtually insisted on demand his passports; if it had refused to harbor the rebel privateers after they had been ordered to put had honorably tried to prevent their escaping; if it had not allowed and strained every point against us, that Government would not have forfeited the respect of every honorable American.

The attitude of our neighbors upon occasion of the first serious violation of neutrality from their soil, at once mollifies the jealous suspicion with which they have been regarded and stirred the liveliest of the rebels. Now that we see that they are not abettors, we can tolerate their sympathy, which is the result of ignorance of the merits of the case. The Canadians, like most foreigners, remember the ancient tone of the Government of the United States; but they forget that that tone was given to it by the very faction now in rebellion. That tone was the expression of a spirit essentially anti-American, made up of ignorance on the one hand and of slave-driving insolence upon the other. And it is part of the Nemesis under which we suffer, that we are defending against rebels a Government which the rebels themselves made odious.

We have not sufficiently remembered this in our indignation with the conduct of what were called friendly powers. We saw them sneering at us as we carried the flag against the foe, and told them the flag meant Liberty. We forged that they still put on the same flag in the hands of those who swore that it meant slavery. Governments, like men, act from mixed motives. If our flag had always stood for justice, moderation, friendliness, it would have commanded more sympathy in its extremity. The American people would have been a thousand-fold more dangerous to Europe if the Government had not swaggered. A modest, friendly, but perfectly firm tone, would have won the hearts of the people and conciliated the pride of the aristocracy. But when the dominant party blustered every foreigner felt insulted.

The Canadians have forfeited neither their self-respect nor the regard of a powerful neighbor by showing that they mean neutrality as well as say it.

THE LATEST ASPECT OF THE PEACE QUESTION.

IT is now known that a commission, consisting of ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS of Georgia, R. M. T. HUNTER of Virginia, and A. J. CAMPBELL of Kentucky, formerly of the United States Supreme Court) applied, on the 29th of January, for permission to come to General GRANT'S head-quarters, which was granted. They are stated to appear before the Government very much in the same way in which BLAIR has approached the rebel authorities in Richmond. But the fact that the most prominent members of the commission is the Vice-President of the rebel Government makes an important difference between the two cases, notwithstanding it is given out that the mission is intended only to represent the people of the Southern States. Besides, we learn from the Richmond Sentinel that on the previous days DAVIS and STEPHENS had been engaged in a long consultation on public affairs."

This commission, following so closely upon Mr. BLAIR'S private mission to Richmond, has more significance than it could otherwise have. For it indicates, either that the rebel authorities are determined to learn from our Government some distinct statement in regard to the only possible terms of peace, such as shall further their own ends by rallying the people of the South in a last desperate effort to gain their independence, or that the people of the South are themselves anxious to make peace on the basis of reconstruction.

If the former be not indicated the latter must be. For the rebels already know from MR. BLAIR'S statements, if from no other source, that no terms will be conceded by our Government involving separation. Unless the object be to arouse the Southern people anew, the appointment of such a commission is useless and absurd. So long as the rebels claim the right of secession, there is no common ground on which to rest any negotiations.

What the issue of this matter may be is now uncertain. But this much is certain. If UNION and Peace can not be obtained by the immediate and unconditional submission of the rebels to the Constitution and Government of the United States, then they must come as the result of the combinations which General GRANT and SHERMAN are now forming for just that end.

A MODEL LETTER.

EARL RESSELL ought to go to school to the Foreign Minister of the Netherlands. That gentleman, like the Earl, received the circular of the European ministers of the rebellion. But unlike the Earl, whose clumsy and foolish reply exasperated every body, the Dutch premier, after simply acknowledging the receipt of the circular, merely adds:

"In thanking you for this communication, and with an earnest wish for the prompt re-establishment of peace in America, I beg, nevertheless, to accept the assurance of my high consideration. E. CREMER."

AS ARTEMUS WARD said of WASHINGTON—E. CREMER certainly does not slop over. His letter is a model.

INTERESTING ITEMS.

COMPTE'S COUSTSHIP.—It is recorded in Chembre's "Book of Wonders" that when Mr. Nicholas Comte married the girl who became his wife. He first saw her in company for some half an hour one evening. Shortly after work, in the dead of winter, when the snow lay several feet deep in the streets, he chanced to be out on a visit of duty to pass the house of her parents. It was hardly light, but there was the cold to chill, numbing a wish to loiter. That action made her mistress of Colbitz's best horse. Whenever he was to be out of work at home he exclaimed, "Thatis the girl for me!" She was the daughter of a sergeant of artillery, and there only thirteen. By his intense charm the artillery was entered to England, and she had to go with her father. Colbitz by this time had managed to save 150 guineas as a foot-soldier—the produce of extra work. Considering that Woolwich, to which his sweet-heart was bound, was a gay place, and that she was courted by many suitors, who moved to her beauty, might tempt her by their wealth; and unwilling that she should be deceived by hard work and love—for all his prudence guineas, and proved that she would not run them off—he would get money enough to buy good clothes, and live in reasonable lodgings, and be as happy as the rich until he could be able to join her. Four long years elapsed before they met: Colbitz, when he reached England, found her a maid-of-all-work, at £5 a year. On his arrival, without saying a word about it, she placed in his hands his portal of 150 guineas unbroken. He obtained his discharge from the army, and married the brave and thrifty woman. She made him an admirable wife—never was he tired of speaking her praises; and whatever comfort and success he has had in life, it was his delight to ascribe to her care and to her inspiration.

PERSONS have grown wild about Fort Fisher. The name of the Federal commander of the expedition and of the rebel garrison seem to have been arranged with an especial reference to the fitness of things. There was painter with bows it that the garrison at Fort Fisher was to be "Butler-fied," and the name of Bragg-lo-ing over the end of the bridge, and, stepping him, asked the price of a ferry. "Thirty cents apiece with the Jew" he was were all fresh laid this morning." "Very good," said Hermann, "I will take a dozen at the price." The proprietors were exceedingly proud, and the conjurer then proceeded to crack one of the eggs. "Dot is not bad," said not the Jew's averment as to their freshness; but Hermann, undismayed by the result, slowly chipped off the top of the shell and fished out a sovereign from the inside of the unconscious yolk. The astonishment of the Jew he did the same with a second and third—which both yielded the same result. Then, with a bland smile, Hermann Moses flung back the nine pipsters, shouldering his bag, and with a ringing laugh of delight, left the would not sell at the price. Hermann and his companion slowly followed him, and found him at the Bull's Head Inn, in a quiet corner of the neighboring mosque-yard, where they found him hard at work breaking eggs. Another offer was made for the whole, but, though more than a dozen had already been smashed without the expected result of eggs turning up, the Youth refused business, and was left peacefully engaged in the whole calamity of the Jew in search of the golden deposit.

THE first volume of Napoleon's "Life of Cæsar" will be published on the 15th of February. It will appear simultaneously in French and German, into which latter language it has been translated by H. Fournier, Professor at the Liberty of the Louvre. Numbers of foreign editors are expected in Paris to obtain early impression of the work. The first volume is devoted to the geographic and ethnologic description of Gaul, Germany and Britain.

THE JEWS.—There are in the world about 7,000,000 Jews: about 3,000,000 in Europe, 1,000,000 in Asia, and three millions 1,000,000. It is remarkable that in England, France, and Belgium, the number is diminishing, while it is increasing elsewhere. At Frankfort-on-the-Main, where there is the largest Jewish community in Germany, it has risen from 9,000 to 12,000 in fifteen years. In France there are 80,000 Jews, in England 40,000.

A DAY IN JUNE.—A June day comprises a period of twenty-four days like ours. We are familiar with the early twilight of the morning. One earth, in the wondrous transformation with which the glories of the sun-set dissolve into the glories of the dawn, the sun-rises close their holy eyes as the timid blush of morning steals over their cheeks, the tide of light flows in upon it to fill the celestial canopy, and when, as a climax to the glowing splendors of the sun-rise, the orb of day rises of the morning and promises himself the heat of the day. The twilight which follows the sun-set is unlike that of noon. No gentle transition from darkness to light, no slow unfolding of night's mantle. The sun sinks down as modestly into the sun slowly accomodates itself to the changing circumstances. For hours after the sun appear to an earthly eye, gilding the summits of the hill-tops, and casting them in shadow on the side. The shade of light in a sea of darkness, while their bases and valleys are wrapped in yet greater gloom. Slowly the silvery flood of light pours down the mountain-sides, and the shadows of plant and tree, slowly shorten as the sun, after a hope of 170 hours, attains its meridian height. For hours after the sun has heavens are behold the stars, although at noonday with a clear sky, are invisible, owing to the dense and reflecting atmosphere. For hours after the sun has gone down his fiery rays upon an arid soil never sheltered by a vegetable covering, and during the night the sand and soil become heated to a temperature equal to that of boiling water. Even the rocks are heated to a degree that causes darkness, but no crimson cutrails of evening clouds around the horizon herald the approach of night. Slowly the sun rises, but not beneath the horizon, no torrent of light intervenes, but a dull and sombre gloom, as if the sun were about to succeed a long and dreary night of 228 hours' duration, and to temperature probably 300 degrees below the freezing point of water

WARNING TO CLERGYMEN.—Hotels were made recently in Prussia, of a new method of warming railway carriages by steam. The boiler of the engine is placed in the baggage-van, and the steam passes through tubes into wooden chambers in the seats of the carriages. The by-valves are provided to carry off the excess of pressure. Such a hundred and fifty miles of railway in this way, if a lever is placed in the carriage, so that the temperature can be regulated according to the wish of the occupants. The experiments, it is said, succeeded perfectly.

AN ARTFUL WITNESS ABSE.—There dwelt in Antwerp an artist named Pillin, who, although he had talent, showed his fist effectively to do their work. He note directed to the choice of life. His favorite study was the dance ted in being a very accomplished one. He may be seen in the morning carrying his canvas and colors to the river or other to the balcony himself with rose and flowers on a stool, engaged in sketching the scene. He is still great too, and with the right seat his brush with perfect facility. The loss of his right hand was expected.

A WARNING.—A young lady suddenly fainted at a ball near Kingsbridge, in Germany, a short time since; and it was afterwards discovered that a gentleman had called upon to render aid that her indisposition arose from the circumstance of some person having pierced her ear and in the trimmings of her dress, which were of the same color.

HOW MUCH DOES THE DAY.—At his meals he never drinks any wine, but after forenoon and afternoon he is fastidious in his food, yet his taste seems to have been formed upon a plain diet. He is very moderate in it, and a preference for much viands as were of an agreeable flavor, but he has always had a dislike to the rich and high. In his later years he retired every night at nine o'clock, and by half-past nine was generally in bed. Before that it not then disposed to rise, he had some one to sit at his bedside and read to him. Often it was the late Professor of the Hebrew Bible read for him, and then after breakfast he studied till dinner. He generally took a short exercise for an hour, generally in a chair in which he used to be conversed with all who came to visit him. He finally took a light supper, smoked a pipe of tobacco, and drank a glass of beer, and then went to bed. Such was, for many other years, Milton found the stillness, warmth, and regularity of his habits favorable to digestion. He was, he said, before rising of a morning, he often dictated to her some verses that came into his mind—needless to say, he dictated his verses, we are told, was that of sitting with his face to the window, and his wife by his side reading to him he used to compose chiefly in the winter.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE SITUATION.

We have to record this week the most important action ever taken by the United States Congress since the formation of our Government on its present Constitutional basis. On the 8th of April, 1864, the Senate passed a joint resolution proposing to the Legislatures of the States an amendment to the Constitution abolishing Slavery. It was passed by a vote of 38 to 6, and was reported to the House. The joint resolution passed the House January 31, 1865, by a vote of 119 to 56, being two votes more than the required majority of two-thirds. We give below the yeas and nays on the two Houses, and the names of Members absent or not voting. The Members supporting the Administration are printed in Roman, the opposing in Italics.

In the Senate, April 8, 1864, the votes were as follow:

The retaliatory resolution has passed the Senate. The legislation in regard to this matter is unnecessarily complicated. The President has the right to say that rebel officers should be a general exchange, at it has done in an amended form of the House resolution, then there is no need of the main resolution itself. The Senate has as much power in the matter as the House, for it has the beginning an exclusive title of commissioners whose business shall be to look after the welfare and treatment of their respective prisoners? The rebels could not, without an expression of their willingness to do so, have entered into negotiations into Southern prisons as a permanent institution; and the Senate's amendment, giving such power to a similar commission, members of which shall reside in our prisons. This commission, however, is to be appointed annually, and if its suggestions and remonstrances were not heeded, it could accurately report all cases of inhuman treatment. These reports would have all the value and effect attaching to other official documents. It is true that such a commission is proposed by the Senate; but it is in the form of an amendment to the retaliatory resolution, and was born in proper effect. The commission should be tried, at least, before we resort to retaliation.

The spring campaign is still in its preliminary stages. The capture of Fort Fisher will doubtless be followed soon by the occupation of Wilmington. Sherman, meanwhile, is measuring the elements of resistance—and these are very considerable—which he will have to overcome. He is reinforcing his army. General Grover has arrived at Savannah, and Sherman's command is thus increased to about 60,000, who will accompany Sherman. The only event which we have recorded during the quiet upon the line has been the raid of the rebel iron-clad fleet, of which we give an account on our first page.

CONGRESS.

January 25:

In the Senate, the House Bankrupt bill was reported from the Judiciary Committee with amendments. The question of relations was resumed, but not carried. The Deficiency bill was reported, and it was determined not to pass it unless the House would strike out the proposition to increase the salary of its employés.

In the House, a resolution of inquiry into the facts connected with trade with the rebellious States was passed. The question of providing for the Heads of Departments should occupy seats on the floor of the House, to be interrogated upon certain rules as to their official departments, and to a limited extent to participate in debate, was defeated.

January 26:

In the Senate, the House Amendatory Loan bill was passed. The Retaliation measure was still under consideration.

In the House, the bill for the admission of Cobbett officers to the floor of the House was debated at some length, but a final consideration was postponed until Friday.

A new Deficiency bill was reported, in which the clause objectionable to the Senate was omitted—but only in form, by being made to read: "Thirty-eight thousand dollars or so much thereof as may be necessary to meet the obligations and forfeit its pledges heretofore incurred."

January 27:

In the Senate, the Deficiency bill was passed without the objectionable amendment. The Retaliation measure was still under debate.

In the House private bills were considered.

January 30:

In the Senate, a resolution was adopted providing for the publication of the correspondence of President Madison. The rest of the session was taken up in the consideration of the resolution appointing a committee on contractions, and of the Retaliation resolution.

In the House there was a debate on the constitutional amendment.

January 31:

In the Senate, the House bill reducing the duty on printing paper was agreed with an amendment, fixing the duty at 15 instead of 3 per cent. The resolution to appoint the Commission to visit the rebel capital and Mr. Hale, who indulged in a long speech on the Treaty done in the Civil Rights Bill.

In the House, the Senate's resolution for a committee to count the votes for the Presidential election was concurred in, with an amendment excluding from representation in the Electoral College Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and Tennessee.

January 31:

In the Senate, the retaliation resolution was passed, by 33 to 13, modified by several amendments providing in addition so as to conformable to the laws of nations and to the usages of civilized warfare, and was adopted declaring the sense of the Senate to be in favor of a general exchange of prisoners, and also one to appoint commissioners to look after the condition of our prisoners in future.

In the House the Senate's amendments to submit to the Legislatures of the several States the following amendment to the Constitution:

"ARTICLE 13.—Section 1. Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

"Section 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

GENERAL KENNER GARRARD.

GENERAL G. D. WAGNER.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY T. B. BISHOP.—(SEE PAGE 93.)

GENERAL KENNER GARRARD.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL KENNER GARRARD was born in Garrard County, Kentucky, and is now thirty-five years old. His home from boyhood has been in Cincinnati, Ohio. He entered West Point in 1847, graduated in 1853, and was appointed to the First United States Dragoons. In 1855 he was transferred to the Second United States Cavalry, and in 1861 promoted to a Captaincy. Up to this date his service had been mostly in Texas and New Mexico. In 1856, while Adjutant of the Second United States Cavalry, the following were officers in that regiment: A. SIDNEY JOHNSTON, Colonel; R. E. LEE, Lieutenant-Colonel; HARDEE and GEO. H. THOMAS, Majors; VAN DORN, E. KIRBY SMITH, STONEMAN, PALMER, OAKES, and EVANS, Captains; and R. W. JOHNSON, FIELD, HOOD, FITZHUGH LEE, COBEY, and PFIFFER, Lieutenants. All these have since held positions as general officers in the Federal and Rebel armies, and most of them have been noted for their signal ability. In April, 1861, Captain GARRARD was, with the troops under General TWIGGS in TEXAS, surrendered to the rebels, remaining under parole until September, 1862. His comrades tried hard to persuade him to join them, appealing to him as a man of Southern birth. But their proffers were firmly rejected, and he, with great difficulty, made his way from Texas to Washington, with twenty thousand dollars of government funds in his pockets, which was safely turned over to the Government. He was appointed Commandant at West Point in December, 1861, where he introduced some useful changes in the drill and instruction of the Cadets. In September, 1862, he was released from parole by exchange, and resigned his post at West Point, to take command, as Colonel, of the One Hundred and Forty-sixth New York Volunteers. This regiment soon became an efficient one, and, with him as its leader, took part in the battles of Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, and Gettysburg. He succeeded General WEED (who was killed at Gettysburg) in the command of the Third Brigade of General STARR'S Division, being appointed Brigadier-General of Volunteers in July, 1863, and in November, 1863, a Major in the Third United States Cavalry. In December, 1863, he was made Chief of the Cavalry Bureau at Washington, but was the next month, at his own request, relieved from that duty to take command of the Second Division of Cavalry in the Army of the Cumberland, under General SHERMAN. General GARRARD took an active part in General SHERMAN'S campaign, from its commencement to the taking of Atlanta. He participated in the battle of Nashville under General THOMAS, who makes in his report particular mention of General GARRARD'S gallant conduct. On the left of M'ARTHUR, he carried the enemy's intrenchments in his front, capturing all the artillery and troops on the line.

VIRGINIANS DRAWING THEIR RATIONS FROM THE FEDERAL COMMISSARY.

"THE E'EN BRINGS A' HAME."

Down the hills the wind is sharp and cold,
The sweet young grasses wither on the wold,
And we, O Lord! have wandered from thy fold!
But evening brings us home.

Among the mists we stumbled and the rocks
Where the brown lichen whitens, and the fox
Watches the straggler from the scattered flocks;
But evening brings us home.

The sharp thorns prick us, and our tender feet
Are cut and bleeding, and the harsh briar upset
Their pitiful entreaties, and we meet
When evening brings us home!

We have been wounded by the hunters' darts.
Our eyes are blinded, and our hearts
Search for Thy coming;—when the light departs
At evening, turns us home.

The darkness gathers. Through the gloom no star
Rises to guide us. We have wandered far—
Without Thy lamp we know not where we are:
At evening, bring us home.

The clouds are round us, and the snow-drifts thicken.
O thou, dear Shepherd! leave us not to sicken
In the rude night, our tatter'd footsteps quicken,
At evening, bring us home.

ESCORT DUTY BY A RED BEAR.

My name is Rufus Brewin, and I am an aggrieved man. For that matter I have always been an aggrieved man in one respect; for some smart chap having discovered years ago that Rufus Brewin was nothing more than Red Bear, my friends have found it very witty ever since to call me by that ridiculous title. For my part I don't see the fun.

I am not married. I never thought I should like to be; and in fact, partly from choice, partly through having spent the best of my youth in India making a fortune, I have had very little to do with women.

Last month, however, I had to go to New York. I don't mind saying that I live in Boston; in fact, I have been for several years considered one of the principal patrons of the first hotel there, and I don't know whether the proprietor would feel that he could go on if I was to remove from his best suite of apartments.

But although a Boston man myself, I don't believe in Boston dentists. They may be all very well, but Doctor Blank, Broadway, New York, is the man for my money. Doesn't it stand to reason now, when one fellow-charges you ten dollars for filling a tooth, and another only ventures to ask five, it's because the first one feels his work is worth twice as much as the other's? I always employ the most expensive workman of all sorts, and I consequently find that the theory as a sound one.

So after grumbling all day with a toothache that finally wouldn't let me enjoy my dinner, without forcing me to send away some splendid grouse untouched, I told my fellow to put up my hair-brushes and a clean shirt, get me a ticket to New York, and call a carriage.

He did 't all right; and indeed I'd like to see him fail in obeying orders. He knows me, that fellow does.

"Train leaves at half past eight, Sir. Carriage at the door at eight. Ticket, Sir, and ticket for sleeping-berth. Am I to go, Sir?" says he.

"To watch me while that scoundrel grinds and cuts the nerves out of my jaw-bone? You'd just like to see that, wouldn't you? Yah!"

For I may as well say that I felt a little irritable, what with my teeth, and what with losing the best part of my dinner.

My fellow saw how it was. Bless you, the scamp is quick enough, and he knows how my boots feel; so he was sneaking away when I stopped him.

"Tell the cook, or some of them, to cut off the breast and legs from half a dozen of those grouse and put them up in my bag, with salt, cayenne, and a cruet," said I. "If this current cold snap sticks a shall want something before morning; and I hope you don't think I'm going to poison myself at railway-stops along the road, do you?"

"Yes, Sir—no, Sir, I mean," says the great fool, not knowing how to answer yes and no together by a "Very well, Sir," as no English servant would have done; and before I could find any thing to fling at his head he was gone.

Well, I got to the station, and not wanting to go to sleep immediately, settled myself in the ordinary car as comfortably as I could by turning over the seat in front of me for my legs, and putting my fur coat in the angle of the window and the back of my own seat. An old traveler like myself under-tands these things, you see, and I flatter myself that I won't be many chances of comfort go a-begging long in Rufus Brewin's neighborhood.

Well, I'd just got settled, with my bag hung up over my head, when a lady and gentleman came in and sat down in the seat almost of us. I guessed at once that one was young Renard, a lawyer of Boston, for whom I have considerable regard, and, in fact, the people with whom I should select as my own legal adviser had I need of such an employé.

The lady I couldn't see at first; for Mr. Renard sat in such a way with his head bent down in front of hers, as quite to conceal it. Presently the bell began to jingle, and they shook hands and said good-by. Then Mr. Renard getting up saw me, and hesitated, went back and whispered a few words to the lady, then came across and asked if he should introduce me to his cousin, who was going to New York alone.

Gracious! I couldn't say no, now could I? And yet what a nuisance to say yes! Of course I'd got to put my legs down and stand up; I don't believe in this Young America fashion of nodding to a lady over your claim, with your feet on a mantelshelf. Upon my word, Sir, I've seen a fellow do that very thing. I don't mind mentioning that I pushed his feet down, and told him he ought to be ashamed of himself. He wasn't, however—only mad at my friendly interference. Actually I had to knock him down before he could behave himself.

Well, I said what I could, and was introduced to the lady, but, of course, I didn't catch her name. Why is it that when people undertake an introduction they always mumble out the only part that is worth hearing? If I hadn't heard Renard say, as he jumped for the door, "Well, good-by, Kitty," I couldn't tell her now an idea of what to call her. Not that I said Kitty aloud, of course; I cut when I think about her it is as Kitty, and that's what I'm going to call her now.

If Mr. Renard get safely off that train it's more than I should like to answer for. A war will run me very much be bolted, and I hadn't a doubt we should hear a yell, and there'd be a general fuss and confusion in picking him out from among the wheels; but either no accident occurred, or they were very considerately quiet about it, and we were off.

My first concern was to get myself settled in my comfortable angle; but no sooner had I done so than I began to wonder whether I ought not to be making myself agreeable to the young woman whom the introduction had in a measure placed under my charge. But then, how was I to do it? I had nothing to say to her, I knew, and probably she had as little to say to me. Besides, I didn't know her name, and how was I to talk across the car even if I did?

While turning these thoughts in my mind I looked over at the subject of them. She was just taking off her bonnet and putting it by the strings to the cushioned panel over her head. Then she smoothed her hair with a very white hand, and took from her lap something in a bewildering little hood, made of blue and white yarn, with a blue bow at the top, and another under the chin, and slipped it a-mafoam in the shape it soon since discovered.

This she carefully tied on; and I was quite interested to see how nicely it fitted, the bow under the chin, quite straight and true, when she made it. I do so like to see any one exact. While she was doing this I noticed that for the first time. By George, Sir, you may think you've seen pretty women, but you never saw one like that! Such bright hair, such a fair skin, such eyes—none of your die-away flax-colored stuff, but bright solid yellow, just like lagot gold. Then, such a pretty color in her cheeks, and such a little rosy mouth when she laughed! I never thought much about a woman's looks before; but I've looked at every one I've met since, and there's not one of 'em to be per sample. I suspect the rest of the bale has been picked up for Mohammed's Paradise, that the tegs given over there in Bengal used to be thought so much.

So I stared, and stared, until a little smile began to twitch about the corners of her mouth, and she turned to look out the window. Lord, Sir! how I felt when it came across me that I was making a deuce of-a-fool-of-myself! I thrust myself directly that I wouldn't look at her again all night; in fact, I fairly turned my back, and looked out of the window. I was horribly ashamed, I was snapped, I was so afraid of doing it again.

But what do you think happened next? Why, as I was sorting away, and seeing nothing but a great black hole outside the car, the softest, sweetest little voice you ever heard said—

"Don't you think it's dangerous for them to go so fast in the night, Mr. Brewin?"

Mr. Brewin! She'd got my name and all, you see! just as pat as if she'd known me a dozen years, And all so natural! No one would have thought it strange if she'd used that moment to ask me to do that she felt it any way strange to speak to me, only when I started quick, and turned round, she looked a little surprised, and smiled in a shy way that was prettier than all.

I told her I thought there was no danger, and asked if she felt frightened at all. I suppose I did, for she wasn't much used to traveling by night; so I concluded she felt lonesome, and I told her she had better come over and sit by me. So she did, right out of room. Of course I had put my legs down when I first spoke, so there was really a very good chance for me to stretch out; but I didn't do it, for I sat there a little, then laughed a little, and said, "Oh no, thank you, Sir."

Somehow I saw that I had made another blunder, and that kept me quiet for a while, till the cars stopped somewhere, and I began to delay a minute or two, as much as to say, "Now is a good chance to offer to take Miss Kitty to her berth in the sleeping-car, as I thought she must be tired." But when I leaned over to speak to her, she said she had an objection to the sleeping-car, and had not engaged any berth.

"But, then my berth," said I, "you never are going to sit here all night?"

"Oh yes, I shan't mind it at all; and if you are going to be disagreeable enough to delay a minute on my account," says she, smiling again.

Well, but here was a predicament. I sat back in my seat, and thought it over. It didn't seem the thing to me to go talking off to my own berth, leaving this lonely little thing to sit bolt upright all night, without a soul to look after her. I glanced all round the car. There were two or three disagreeable-looking fellows round the stove, and only one other woman to be seen. No, it wasn't the thing at all to leave her.

Then I wondered why she wouldn't have a sleeping-berth. Perhaps she hadn't the money for it! that was all—but then how was I to find out? I wouldn't do to ask outright, nor it wasn't likely she'd let me pay for one, for she knew I'd no berth! But I might get her to take my berth, and I could find another; or, if I couldn't, it was better for me to stay up than for her.

So I got up and leaned over the back of her seat, not liking to shout my proposition across the car. I tried, too, to speak as carelessly as possible, so that she shouldn't feel it any great matter.

"I wouldn't sit up all night if I was you," says I. "You can get a very comfortable nap in the sleeping-car, I promise you; and as I don't think I shall lie down to-night, you'd better accept my berth. I've no use for it myself, and you can have it better than not."

She smiled again. Somehow every thing I said seemed to amuse her; but this time the smile was prettier than ever.

"Thank you very much, Sir," said she. "But I really don't wish for a berth. I would have engaged one if I had intended to use one."

She saw right through me, and knew all my little plan. That was as plain as preaching; but I felt that she was more pleased than offended that I had tried to clear her into taking my dollar's worth of sleep, and without thinking I got back to my own seat, but sat down in the empty half of hers.

She looked a little surprised, but made no objection, only went on talking about the sleeping-car, the bad air, and the jolting, and the nightmare feeling of being so shut in, till I began to wonder how I could ever have thought of putting myself into one.

From that we went on chatting about other things, till all at once I found myself in the middle of the evening drive at Calcutta, though how I got round to that I can't tell; but when I stopped to consider about it, Miss Kitty smiled, and nodded, and said,

"Yes, I see it all. Do go on, Mr. Brewin, unless you're tired."

So I went on, and told of all the different sorts of people one sees there, and how oddly the eyes look running after their masters' carriages, and of how pretty the streets look when these carriages light their lamps and all go twinkling off in different directions.

I never saw any one so interested as that girl was in all I had to say. Sat, Sir! I began to wonder why I hadn't talked more about those things since they were so well worth hearing. But just as we were going over the Susquehanna, one of Government House the cars stopped, and a man at the door sung out that we were to go aboard a ferry-boat and change cars.

So Miss Kitty took her bonnet, and I my bag and coat, and we followed the rest out of the warm car into the raw, frosty, moonlight night with no refuge except the crowded cabin of the ferry-boat, so close and hot that I didn't blame Kitty for preferring to stay out.

I put on my great-coat, but shivered underneath it, and the poor little girl, who had no extra wrap, must have been perished with cold.

I give you my word, Sir, I had no idea till that night how wide the Connecticut River is. Talk of the Atlantic, indeed! Anywhere one could get a boat to use one half the time in crossing the Mississippi that we spent that night upon the bosom of the Susquehanna, or Connecticut stream!

At the other side we were bundled into a wretched old car—one of those low-down sorts and no steps. This was miserable enough, and if the railway companies find it pleasant and profitable to smash up their train on the ordinary passengers every few days, they should at least provide a sufficient relay to take their place. Most of us don't mind the chance of being smashed, but I for one do mind the certainty of being uncomfortable, and when I've once been made so in a particular place, I take very good care in future to avoid that place. "A word to the wise," etc.

And then I could see with half an eye that poor little Kitty was getting very tired. She didn't smile much now; and when I came back after looking through the train for a better seat, I found her settled up in a very small narrow beach with her head resting on the back in a most uncomfortable attitude. An idea struck me, and not a bad one, either. Under the sleeping-car I found my berth, and appropriated the pillow and blanket. The conductor thought, I suppose, that I was stealing them; for he bustled up as fierce as a terrier and asked what I was doing. I liked that, and just asked him if I didn't pay for the use of the blankets when I hired them. He said yes. Then I told him I was going to use them in my own fashion and walked off, leaving him staring after me.

I felt I was getting a little irritated at being watched that way, and I had some idea of taking the fellow by the collar and knocking him down, right off the train, but concluded not to do so, as he was after all hardly worth the trouble.

But when I got back and looked in her face, and found the great eyes staring at me with just the queerest mixture of surprise and amusement that ever you saw, I thought I ought to have said something, though just what I didn't know, so I began,

"I thought you'd be cold; there isn't any fire in this car, and so—"

"So you have brought me your own pillow and blanket, and expect me to sit up in the cold yourself!" said she, trying to throw off the blanket.

"Stop!" says I, and if I was a more decided character than I am, I might to use that rascally conductor too a blame. "Stop! I shan't use these things at any rate, I give you my word on that, and you must take them, and must keep them."

She looked right up in my face with another of those teasing little smiles.

"Must I, indeed?" "well then, I must."

And shutting her eyes she went off to sleep just like a baby as they say, though I don't believe any baby ever looked so pretty or so innocent or so helpless as that girl did, with the red blanket coming up under her chin, and the blue ribbons strewed all over the pillow.

I sat down in the seat behind—the end seat of the car, it was, and there was a window; but there was no other vacant near at hand, and I wasn't going to desert my charge after all I'd done.

So Miss Kitty slept; and I swore at my teeth, which had been very quiet till that ferry-boat business worked them up, and the seat by the loose window kept them so.

By-and-by the cars stopped again. I looked out at the window, and there, if you'll believe me, was that—that Renard's cousin, Kitty, the Connecticut, again, and another ferry-boat ready for us to cross in. I jumped up, and went to look for the conductor, thinking to make some remarks to him, and ask the names of the directors of this Company, but the minute he saw me coming he dodged and made off somewhere; but a brakeman told me that this time the car itself was going over, and that there was a refreshment-room on the boat where I could get something to keep out the cold.

I thanked him for the hint, for it was kind!t meant; but if that man thought Rufus Brewin was going to poison himself with ferry-boat whisky or bad coffee, he was much the shovelful inside of it. B.R.'s principles, that's all.

However, I looked in at the refreshment-room, and finding that all that they called tea, I drank some of it. It was hot, and it had milk and sugar in it. Whether it was tea or not I don't know, and I thought a cup of it might warm up poor Kitty a bit. So I told the fellow to draw another cup of it, and to one a wretched-looking yellow cake that he called round cake. I didn't taste it myself, but I knew that women liked such stuff, so I took it.

Then I went to the buffet with that cup, we're just across," says the fellow as I took it away. I found him a two-dollar bill, and told him that would buy a gross of such cups, and fill them with hot water into the bargain. I dare say I was correct, but the man didn't seem pleased, though he pocketed the money. You see I wasn't going to hurry a lady about drinking her tea just to accommodate such a fellow as that, or to save the price of a tea-cup.

I came steering back through the crowd, squaring my elbows, and singing out to every one to make way, I looked up at the window, and what should I see but Miss Kitty watching me. Her eyes sparkling, and her little teeth flashing in the gaslight in a regular laugh.

I was glad she felt so merry, but I hoped she wasn't laughing at me.

When I got to the car, however, she had sobered down wonderfully, and thanked me very prettily for all the pains I had taken. I told her there was no harm—that she should like the tea, that the tea, for it was hot; and then I went and stood at the end of the car, for if there's any thing spoils my appetite it's to be watched. I always make my fellow look out of the window while I'm at dinner, unless he's actually doing something.

When we'd fairly got started I looked round and found Miss Kitty had finished her supper, so I came back and took the cup. She had left a good bit of the cake in the paper, and I told her I was afraid it wasn't good. She said, "Oh yes;" but I knew better; so when I had quietly chucked the cup and saucer out of the window, cake and all, I got out my little package of grouse, split a roll, laid some delicious bits of breast on it, salted and cayenned them, and handed it to her with a clean fork underneath.

"There, Miss Kitty," said I, "is something better than cake which you couldn't eat."

She looked up in astonishment.

"Why you are a regular magician, Mr. Brewin," said she. "Where could you get wild-ducks at this time and place?"

"Now that was a little discouraging, wasn't it? To find that she didn't know grouse from wild-duck, for I consider an appreciative taste in food one of the first accomplishments. But I restrained, and the little girl soon showed that she could eat grouse if she couldn't name them. It did my very heart good to see the delicious way in which she ate. Then she didn't eat them all, and only a crumb of the roll, so I finished what she left, and Gad, Sir, I never tasted a sweeter morsel! I'd had a dozen of the grouse afterward, but it was another thing.

Well, I looked Kitty all up again in the blanket, fixed the pillow under her head, and then, you know, I had a smile that was almost as good as a—well, as I should fancy a kiss might be, and I was just settling myself for a nap when—

"Ne-ew Haven! Cha-nge cars!" yelled the conductor in at the door, and I could see the fellow's eyes twinkle at the satisfaction as he looked at me and my arrangements.

I'll just ask any reasonable Christian if it wasn't enough to make a man swear! If it hadn't been for frightening that little girl, I promise you I would have tried what relief there was in it; but sort of regard to her I kept all my oaths to myself, and gave her own "Oh dear!" but I looked at that conductor as I passed him with my pillow and blanket, and I looked at him till I saw his eyes blink, but I didn't say a word.

The new car was as hot as the other had been cold, crammed with people, and so close that they must have spent their time all the way from Boston in eating onions and drinking whisky-toddy. However, I found a seat two people had just left, got upon a ventilator, and we sat down to tea-thet.

I put the pillow under Kitty's head, and wrapped the blanket round her; but there was no room in the middle of the seat, so she couldn't have laid down if I had given her the whole.

Poor little thing! She was so tired by this time that she dropped right to sleep with her head against the high back of the seat, and her mouth, the edge of the cary, it kept sliding one way and the other, until at last I put up my hand and drew it down to my shoulder. What I had done if I was frightened. Perhaps she would be so angry when she woke that she wouldn't speak to me again. Perhaps it was shaking the truck my friend had placed in me when he put his cousin under my charge. At first I would have given any thing that I had to let that face I took it from; but pretty soon I forgot all this in seeing how pretty those yellow curls looked, straggling down from under the blue hood and across my arm, and how delicate the line of the profile was, and how calm and even the breath that kept rising in little warm puffs against my cheek.

Perhaps all this is simple enough to other men who have been through such things in their youth; but I can tell you that when a man comes to be fifty, and never has known any woman so well as his negro laundress, why this sort of thing seems like a new revelation.

Sleep, Sir! I didn't close my eyes again that night, I promise you. I just sat there, hardly daring to breathe for fear of disturbing her, thinking a soft rustling whether it might be possible that a day would come when she would put that little head on my breast of her own accord, and whether there could be any thing in me that might make her forgive my fifty years and my selfish old bachelor ways. I never wronged her thinking that my money would tempt her; but it did please me to fancy how I could bring treasures from the ends of the earth to heap upon her; and I thought how I could call out the rest of my life to making her happy, and worship her as no young man ever could. Fact, Sir, I think there's something in witchcraft; they believe it in the East, and why shouldn't we? And, unless I was bewitched that night, I can't understand my own folly; for before the grey morning light came in at the window I had built the finest castle that ever stood in Spain, and had brought myself to believe that it was more than Miss Kitty might consent to inhabit it with me.

They say there's no fool like an old fool, and I believe it.

Just as I was thinking of the set of diamonds I'd order for her from London, Miss Kitty awoke, and lifted up her head so sleepily that I don't believe she knew where it had been lying.

By this time we were getting into New York, and she rubbed her eyes and said she must put on her bonnet. So I hauled it down, and watched her put it on, and then admired the way her hair fell, folded the veil back and put it in her travelling-bag. When all was done, she turned smiling to me, and said,

"I am sure you must have daughters of your own, Mr. Brewin, you are so interested in hoods and bonnets."

Here was a blow at the very foundation-stone of my castle; but I stammered out that I had no daughters, and was not even married.

"Oh!" said Miss Kitty, and looked a little confounded. I suppose she had thought me a patriarch.

However, I thought I should look differently after I had been to the dentist and the barber, and I said,—

"Shall you stay long in New York, Miss Kitty?"

"Mrs. Lewis, please. No, Sir; I shall join some friends at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, and leave with them to-morrow for California. I am going out to join my husband, who has been there a year."

I took a shower-bath once, and the sensation I experienced when Mrs. Lewis pronounced these words brought back that horrible sensation, the effect of memory could possibly have done.

Whether that gift—for she couldn't have been over fourteen the most innocent or the most artful of creatures I don't know. Whether she knew what she had been doing all night, and was but interested in finishing off the business with this last neat little blow, or whether she had just thought me a civil old man who took a fancy to her interest in her, I won't presume to say. But I think—I hope the latter, for the sake of human nature, for the sake of my own belief in womankind.

I didn't say any thing for a minute, and then I wished her a pleasant voyage.

She thanked me, and said she could hardly hope to find so kind and attentive a companion as I had been.

I looked at her sharply enough, and her eyes looked straight into mine with a little smile, but not the least bit of malice. No, Sir, I'll never believe that girl had been consciously making a fool of me. She never could have given me that look afterward.

We didn't say much more, for we were almost at the station. I put her in a carriage, paid the man, and gave him the direction. Then I took off my hat and said her good-morning; but she leaned out a little white hand out at the window for me to shake, and said,

"Good-by, Sir. I shall never forget your kindness."

That was the last I saw of her.

Well, well, it was more my own fault than my one's else, I suppose. But if Tom Renard had introduced me as he should have done, as he had even spoken of her husband at first instead of at last, I shouldn't have been what I now consider myself—an aggrieved man.

THE VAMPIRE.

It was in February, 1841—, that, having obtained the appointment of usher through the interest of a friend, I started on my way to N——, for the first time. I occupied myself a great deal, as may be imagined, in speculating on my future kind of life, and once or twice I fell asleep. At length the coach drew up in the old market-place and I alighted.

I was accosted by a boy, a pale-faced boy, with a peculiar expression of countenance that seemed to haunt me with its singularity, "Was I for N——— Grammar School?"

I was.

Then the doctor had commissioned him to show me the way. And he went with me accordingly.

My companion was taciturn beyond, any thing that my experience of boys had hitherto encountered. I asked some questions as to the school. He would answer monosyllabically, and then relapse into silence, apparently regarding me as wrong with the most intense interest. His reticence did not appear to me to be the result either of shyness or churlishness. Had he been so young a boy I should have said his spirit was crushed out of him by the possession of a deadly secret. Altogether his manner puzzled me.

My speculations, however, were cut short by our arrival at the school, and in the occupation of making the doctor's acquaintance and arranging my room. I had little time to think of my recent companion. At supper I noticed him among the other boys, but as soon as he caught my eye he turned his head away abruptly. A mysterious boy.

After supper and prayers the doctor called me aside.

"Mr. Merton," he said, "the dormitory attached to your room is under your supervision. Be so good as keep a sharp look-out on it. There is something wrong," he added, in a lower voice, "about that dormitory, and I should be only too glad if your vigilance could discover it. It is a most mysterious circumstance. The master appears to me to be most efficient; in fact, I am assured it is by competent authorities, and yet if I put the most healthy boys there, in three days they be become pale and haggard. It's a very extraordinary thing, and most annoying. Saunderson," he added, pointing to the mysterious boy looking into the fire with the strange, abstracted look I had noticed before, "is the prefect of your dormitory, and will initiate you into any of our customs. Good-night."

In a quarter of an hour all the boys were safely in bed and the lights out. I should have mentioned that my bedroom commanded a view of the dormitory by means of a window which I could open or shut at pleasure. The doctor's parting words had connected themselves in my mind with the mysterious boy. I felt disinclined for sleep, so shading my lamp, I stationed myself at the window and took up a book. I heard the clock strike eleven—twelve—one. The restless impulse which I could not account for, I felt constrained to go round the dormitory at the risk of disturbing its occupants. All was quiet. Some were asleep, two were all slumbering peacefully on, and as I looked at each one in turn, I bore witness to the truth of the doctor's assertion as to the pallor and haggardness of the inmates of my dormitory. They might have been scholars of Dotheboy's Hall.

Nearest my window slept Saunderson. The old expression that had attracted my notice seemed to have given place in sleep to an expression of peaceful innocence more like a girl's than that of a boy with one arm thrown over the quilt I thought him even nice-looking.

I had not been in my room five minutes before I was attracted by a sound from the dormitory, and looking through the window, I saw Saunderson rise from his bed and approach that of his nearest neighbor. He leaned over him and—oh, Heaven!—the sight seemed to paralyze me!

I saw him with some sharp instrument open a vein in the boy's neck, and applying his lips, he drank a long draught of blood.

In a moment all was explained; the pallor of his companions; his own strange manner. Saunderson was a vampire!

I had read of these monsters, and had regarded them as the creations merely of a popular superstition. Now, at the sight of one, I found myself face to face with one, and with one, too, who was destined to be my near companion perhaps for years.

Meanwhile the boy-vampire had quitted his first victim, and, to my inexpressible horror, was snacking his lips after the manner of a connoisseur, as the manner of a drunkard who has taken a draught of more than usually generous wine. He passed on to the next bed and repeated his loathsome operation.

Five beds did I see him visit in this manner, while the power of speech seemed dried up in me with very horror. I essayed to shout, but the sound died upon my lips. I struggled to leap through the window and fall upon the boy, but, luckily for me, or murder might have been the result, an unseen power seemed to rivet me to the spot. Gradually I turned and fled down the corridor like a maniac.

To arouse the doctor was the work of a moment. I tried to explain it to him in a few hurried words, but my agitation was so great, and my speech so incoherent, that I made a miserable failure at narrating. I dragged him into my room, and pointing to the open window I left the terrible facts to speak for themselves.

A moment afterward I saw him leap through the window and alight at Saunderson's feet. I saw the boy raise his light form from the bed-side and meet the gaze of the doctor. I saw him fling himself at his feet, and heard him crave in piteous accents for mercy.

"The impulse was upon me," he said; "I could not resist it. Doctor, I loathe, I hate myself more than you can loathe or hate me, but I can not resist it. Oh, I am miserable—miserable!"

His wail was so piteous that I felt my loathing fast turning into commiseration. Yes, I pitied this monster. This was the terrible secret that he bore about him; this was the curse that, more surely than the leprosy of old, separated him from his fellow-beings, and made his inmost soul cry out, "Unclean, unclean!" Surely he was to be pitied.

I looked into the doctor's face, and saw that his feelings were akin to mine, but he was little accustomed to allow his face to be an index to the soul within. I could see clearly that he merely said, "This must be seen to." Then he added, "Mr. Merton, you are agitated; you had better retire." He left the room with Saunderson, and I heard the key of the turret-chamber turned.

The vampire was in solitary confinement, with no blood to prey upon but his own.

I turned into bed, and tried to compose myself to sleep; but it was not to be. I had a dream of an earthquake, and the next moment I awoke up in the coach, which was jogging over the rough stones of ——— Hill.

"I fear you have been dreaming, Sir," said my opposite neighbor.

I had indeed.

But the most curious part is yet to come.

In due time I really did reach N——. The coach put up at the White Hart, so I had no need of a boy vampire or otherwise, to show me the Grammar School. I met with a kind welcome from the doctor, and supped with him and his wife in private. In the pleasures of the social meal I could afford to laugh at my strange dream, merely noting that the doctor was singularly like one of the merry fertile brain had conjured up, and that what I saw of the school on alighting bore an equal resemblance to my phantom counterpart. But then I had had a very minute description both of the one and the other, so no great wonder after all.

"The boys are gone to bed," said the doctor, rising and lighting my candle, "and I dare say you will not be sorry to follow their example. I have had a bed prepared in my dressing-room, so that you may not be disturbed. To-morrow night you can take charge of your dormitory. There are twenty-five boys under your supervision."

"What a charge of responsibility!" I thought as I retired, and I cudgeled my brains in vain to recall if any one could have revealed to me this item of the interior economy of the Grammar School. In this process I fell into a profound and dreamless sleep, from which I was recalled in the morning by the six o'clock bell.

After prayers I took my class, and there sure enough straight before me was Saunderson, the vampire! I never was so utterly and hopelessly confused in all my life. There he was, no mistake at all about it, only he appeared to be nervous and shy, rather than burdened with conscious guilt. I could not take my eyes off him. I fully stared him out of countenance. He took refuge in a scrutiny of his shoe-string, and the likeness was complete.

"Saunderson, construe."

"Who, Sir?" asked a dozen voices.

"That boy," I said, indicating the vampire.

"Oh, Sir, he's new."

The difference of name seemed to remove an incubus from me. Norris alias Saunderson, alias the vampire, stood up, blushed red, and broke down hopelessly, and took refuge in the shoe-string. It was Saunderson: there was no denying it. The night I should be left in "tapping" the dormitory boys, and smacking his hungry lips over the loathsome draught. I started. Norris religious!

"Norris," said the doctor in the afternoon, "show Mr. Merton the town." I was obliged to submit. "One of my best boys," he whispered, as we passed out. I shrugged my shoulders.

Norris showed me every thing N—— could boast of, and to do him justice, he evidently strove hard to please; but I found him as taciturn and monosyllable as my dream had foreshadowed, and, as you may suppose, I took no trouble to draw out a vampire.

At night I had some business to transact with the doctor, and when I left my dormitory the boys were in bed and asleep—twenty-five boys—and Norris just under my window! Before putting out the lamp I looked at him. He was a healthy-looking lad as ever one could desire to see. I almost resented their good condition. What business had Saunderson's vampire with the fair and well-liking when they slept with a vampire?

I visited Norris last. There he lay, just as I had pictured him, with his head out of his bed, the look of peaceful innocence on his face. One thing was certain, Norris was very handsome. I may add that this reminded me of my dormitory and of my own room were precisely similar to that portrayed in my dream. I should have felt the same uncertainty as to where the haunt of it beforehand, as I did with regard to the number of boys in the dormitory, were it not for the utterly improbable resemblance between Saunderson and Norris. I worked myself into such a fit of nervousness that I added yet another precaution by sitting up a few minutes, whence I fully expected to see Norris arise and practice his blood-sucking. But though I heard the clock strike one and two, twelve, and one, but all the hours up to six, nothing of the kind happened. After a while, though a settled aversion to Norris remained in my mind, I found it impossible to reason myself, I ceased endeavoring to catch him in overt acts of vampirism, and even the singular peculiarity of his dream vanished, at least once in the course of the day, in addressing him as Saunderson, and the strange dislike which I bore him, and which was still present to all, at length ceased to cause any speculation.

Months passed on and brought with them very few changes. I was comfortably settled at N——, and still had from my window the supervision of the "North Dormitory." But Norris's place knew him no more. He had gone into solitary confinement in the turret chamber as a convicted vampire. He was dying in a deep decline, and I, as a religious duty, was labouring earnestly and manfully with my aversion. One day he sent for me. I found him in his favorite position, one arm thrown over the coverlet. It was the well-known position of my dream.

"Oh, thank you," he said, bursting into tears. "Oh, Mr. Merton, why have you disliked me so, when I have always prayed that you might like me? Why have you shunned me as you would a vampire?"

What could I say? I could only blubber as a child.

"When I get well will you promise to like me?"

Of course I promised, and did bitter penance in my heart for my unjust dislike. I never had the power of fulfilling my word. He died in a few days.

His simple cross in N—— church-yard—I visited it the other day—bears the inscription,

WALTER NORRIS,
In Peace,
AGED TWELVE YEARS.
SEPTEMBER 6TH, 184—.

I begged his mother, to whom I related all the circumstances, to allow me to erect it to his memory, and for years I have planted and tended the flowers at its base. In an old desk, among the relics of the past, such as the coldest among us hoard up, one of my dearest treasures is a lock of light curling hair, and a boy's neck-tie, the paper attached to which is labeled with the suggestive word, "Saunderson."

I should not have recorded this dream were it not for the strange coincidence attached to it. I must leave to scientific men the explanation of the mystery. Can it be that my unkindness was a necessary preliminary to Norris, and that the dream was permitted for his good? Who can say?

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

SQUARING THE CIRCLE.—If you think it an easy thing to square the circle, just go and settle your wife's bill for hoops.

HORRIBLE AFFAIR.—At a dinner party in the country the other day a great sensation was caused by a gentleman dividing two ladies.

BLUNT, BUT POINTED.
Our Quotations.—Out of the Frying-pan into the fire.

A HORSE WORSTER.—It is rumored that in Paris the Sieur de Mons, Viscount Pau and an equerry had a horse-race, in-stead of beef and mutton. We shall expect to hear of the Misses of Merry introducing the diet into the beau monde.

ORIGIN OF TEETOTALISM.—"A frog," says Professor Bump, "is an amphibious animal what liquors on dry water, and consequently invented the teetotal society." He always walks on a jump, by reason that when he sits down has to stand up. Being a lover of native melodies, he gives free concerts on every night, in the month of May. He likewise provides music for the million, which has been so called because it usually is heard in a hurry-skurry. He is a warmint what sin't no bed when brouled on a gridiron."

"EXTRA-ORDINARY REMEDY."
HOW TO MAKE YOUR HAIR GROW.—Get up early in the morning and gently scrape your skin with a hot-hoe.

THE ENCYCLICAL LETTER.
"The Roman Catholic," the papers would mostly say, "is Peter's bark;" but we say something nearer; therefore the Letter, we'll do the other duty
By the North Pier, in the Isle of Patmos.

A FUNCTIONARY.—It seems that a lawyer is something of a carpenter; he can fix a bill, split a bark, make an entry, put up a case, and frame indictments. Then a jury, put them in a box, nail a witness, hammer a judge, bore a hole, and adjourn the court.

A POLITE CARPENTER.—A country carpenter having neglected to make a gilbet (which was ordered by the executioner), on the appointed time that he had set for it, and the last he had erected, gave so much offence that the Sheriff sent him word that the criminal was to be hung "Follow," said the judge, in a stern tone, "how come you to neglect making the gilbet for every day in the week as I count?" "I humbly beg your pardon," said the carpenter; "but I knew it had been for your forbidden, it would have been done immediately."

NOTHING LIKE LEATHER.—A boot given for the shoe and heel-ing of a gentleman.—"Mr? Pa's gone to all the women in the country to-day, and the men to-to!"

ABSENTEEY "FLOGGED."—The following anecdote is told of the celebrated surgeon, Mr. Abernethy: One day, during the summer season, he was visited by a lady, one of them what he would do in the case of a man being blown up with gunpowder. "Why, madam, I'd let him go down again," was the cool reply. "Twas," rejoined Abernethy. "And suppose the mule should kick you?" was the quick reply, which muscles should I put in motion?" "The flogmuscles of honor of your ugly arm," said the student; "for I should floor you directly."

THAT WON'T WASH.—MRS. BROWN is very much horrified at the appearance of a new advertisement. "Dear me, indeed," said that estimable lady, "I wouldn't wear it under any circumstances."

Why is a badly-conducted hotel like a fiddle?—Because it's a vile inn.

SITUATION OF THE POPE.—NON Possumus—up a gumtree.

"You, Sambo, you have fed the pigs?" "Yes, massa, me fed 'um," replied Sambo. "Did you count them?" "Yes, massa, me count 'um all but one." "And why not that one?" "Because, massa, dere be one little speckle pig, he frisk about so much me couldn't count him!"

DEAR SIR,—While resident in a village where he had a wife, my practice was only a half-a-day's work to be became much attacked. The butcher one day told Smith that he had taken a penny loaf, which he intended to carry on in conjunction with his trade as a butcher, and respectfully requested that Smith would take it to sell for him on his sign-board. The Dean took up his pen, and wrote this couplet:

"Here not from pole to pole, but step in here,
Where naught but half-a-penny loaf is dear."

A young man advertises for a situation as scrub-law in a respectable family. Would have no objection, he says, to go a short distance into the country.

A Western editor was recently requested to send his pecuniary terms to a subscriber, provided he had any to the "trade." At the end of the year he found that his new subscriber was a dealer in tallow.

BASE COIN.—Money placed in a foundation-stone.

A gentleman having attended a country chapel at which a local preacher who was a baker officiated, was asked by his wife what he thought of his discourse on second sin. "Yes," was the reply, "quite a flowery discourse."

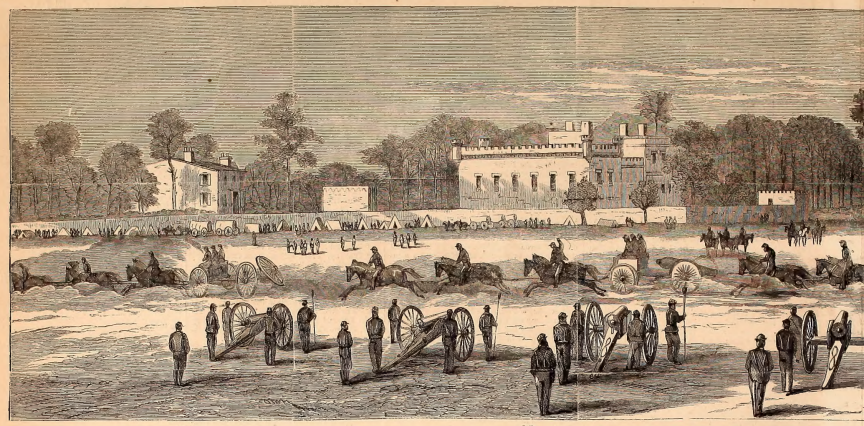
PROVOKING.—To dream that you have lots of money, and then wake up and find yourself an editor.

The bat was passed round in a certain congregation for the purpose of collecting alms. It was found to be made the circuit of the church it was handed to the minister, who had fallen asleep during the sermon. He awoke with a start and he threw not a penny in it. He inverted the bat over the pulpit cushion and shook it, that no complement might be known, then looking toward the ceiling, he exclaimed in a solemn voice, "I thank God that I got back my bat from this congregation!"

Why is a tight shoe like a fine costume?—Because it makes the corn ache.

An Irish girl at play on Sunday being accosted by the priest, "Good-morning, daughter of the Evil One," meekly replied, "Good-evening, your reverence."

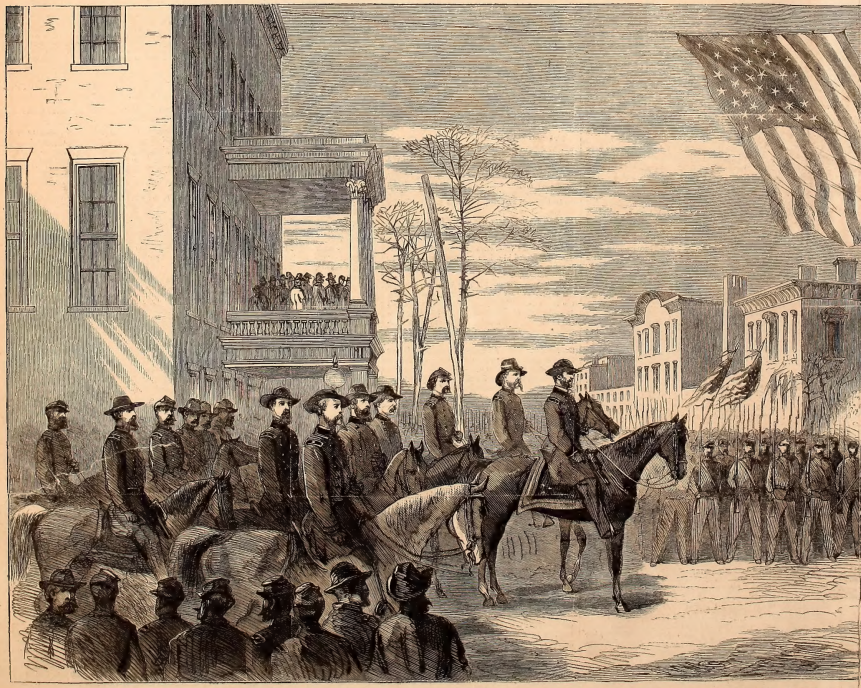
WANTED.—Some of the tree produced when "mischief is brewing."



A CURIOUS LOAN.—"I say, Jack," shouted a Smithfield salesman to a friend on the other side, "can you move a lot lend us a bank of your dog, till you?"

Why do pioneers go before the army?—To ease the way.

A SHREWD SUGGESTION.—A gentleman, being in company with the Earl of Chatham, was asked by his lordship for his definition of wit. "Wit," he replied, "my lord, is what a penny would be, given by your lordship to your humble servant—a good thing well applied."



An Irishman, in passing through the streets, picked up a light guinea, which he was obliged to sell for eighteen shillings. Next day he saw another guinea lying in the street. "No, no," says he, "I'll have nothing to do with him, I had trouble enough to get rid of his brother."

Why are books the best friends?—Because when they bore you, you can always shut them up without offense!

THE WIND-MILL.

Now, who will live in the wind-mill, who,
With the powdery miller-man?
The miller is one, but who'll make two,
To share his loaf and can?

"Oh I will live with the miller, I!
To grind the corn 's grand;
The great black sails go up on high,
And come down to the land!"

Now, who will be the miller's bride?
The miller's a brute to wed
A girl in her pride, with a sash at her side,
A girl with a curly he'd

"Oh I will be the mille 's wife;
The dust it is all my joy;
To live 'i a wind-mill all my life
Wou'd be a sweet employ!"

Then spake the goblin of the sails
(You heard but could not see),
"The wickedest man of the hills and dales,
The miller-man is he!

"None ever dwelt in the mill before
But died by the miller's cruel hand;
The whiskered rats lap up their gore,
He grinds their bones to meal!"

Oh gossiping goblin, my dreams will be bad,
You tell such dreadful tales!
Oh mill, here's a penny you seem to need,
How wicked you look, black sails!

CAPTAIN JACK BALLAST'S STORY.

My story? Well, I don't see why I shouldn't scratch it down. There's nothin' to be ashamed of in it, so far as I know, an' though you re'lar story-writers may call it "a episode," I think the wind sees than way myself, and there's a bit of love in it too, though you'd never think it was a subject for a love-story to look at me. I'm old enough, d'ye see, to feel safe about the draft, and brown enough to be a Hindian, and as for flesh—well, no matter; some of you slim young dandies will be as stout as I be if you live as long. Besides, that fashionable whittler didn't improve my looks. I'll tell you about that before the story is over, I reckon; at present I'd better heave ahead.

Fat as I am now, I'm a thin man, there was a time when I was as slender a young fellow as ever shipped afore the mast agin his parents' leave. They, Lord bless 'em, hadn't ought to make a sou'wester jumper of me, and I tried measuring rags about a year. Then I couldn't stand it any longer, and jumped the counter for good and for all, an' off I went to sea. I'd had a hankering for it for a good while, and the only thing I ever regretted was the way my mother took it to heart. Wait a bit. Honour bright, there was one thing.

That was Jenny Blush, old Blush's only daughter, and the prettiest girl 'ever cast eyes on. Her skin was just as soft and fair as any baby's. As for her hair, I've got a bit by my old desk up stairs, and though it's crossed the ocean about a dozen times, it's so bright now you'd take it for a gold chain coiled down under the bit of blue ribbon it's tied with.

Old Blush was my captain ashore. I mean to say, he was head of the big dry-goods store where they first set me to measuring rags, and Jenny used to come over every day after ribbons, and calico, and the like, and, Lord love her! I don't find any fault with women-folks looking after such things, though it don't seem a man's place to sell 'em. She looked mighty pretty when she got 'em on, did Jenny. Father and old Blush were fast friends, and when they found out that I was sweet on Jenny they put their heads together and resolved to sanction the match. I was to be taken into partnership, d'ye see, and was to step into the rag business when the old man retired. Fifty-yards, sales-book, sale and retail," was on the sign, but I always called em rags.

Well, Jenny and I were fond of each other, and knew it already, so, the old folks being agreeable, we saw a good deal of each other Sundays and evenings, to say nothing of the romance she made to the store. And I used to with I could make up my mind to it when I was there, but I couldn't, no! I'd did for it. I heard the waves beating about my bed in dreams. I hated the cloth yard and the scissors as the devil hates me lit. And one night I told Jenny so. She cried a bit; but by-and-by she owned that she didn't hate me for it, and we talked of the way I should be a captain, and how she should make every voyage with me, and have a cabin like a parlor for herself.

Then she left off crying. P'raps she kissed me back; and I cut off the yellow curl I told you of with a pair of scissors—the only pleasant job I ever did with 'em—and twisted it up in all my life.

That night I ran away, and though I blubbered like a baby when I passed mother's door, you couldn't have got me back again. What a man wants to be he will be; and there are men meant from their cradles for the water as sartin as the fish are.

I got a letter from old mammy that cut me up, I don't deny; but I was a man now once round, and didn't mean the worst—how should I? When it first came to me that a man that sold rags was better than a sailor it took my breath away. That was when I first went home, d'ye see! Mammy, she sold:d and cried and kissed me; but Martha, and Nicholls, and brother Charles Augustus pitched into me ferocious. Says they: "You've disgraced your family—we've been respectable, genteel folks all our lives, and now we're to have a common sailor for a brother." I caught it—a reg'lar gale; and father put in his oar regarding disobedience. When that came I shaved out, and marched over to old Blush's. Nobody was home but Jenny, and she ran into my arms. Well, we were billing and cooing, as sweet-hearts mostly do, I reckon, when old Blush came home to tea. I never heard a gale o' wind roar louder than he did when he saw me.

"What do you want here, Sir?" says he.

Says I, "Don't you recollect me, Mr. Blush? I'm Jack Ballast."

Says he, "I recollect you well enough, and how dare you show your face here?"

Says I, "I came to see my Jenny."

"Your Jenny?" says he. "My good fellow, Miss Jenny Blush is much too high a woman-sailor before the mast; and whatever there may have been between you when you were entitled to my respect is all over now. You have proved by walking quietly out yourself or of being kicked out."

Any one but Jenny's father would have been floored for that. I just looked down and saw my fists shut up of themselves, and tried to keep 'em so.

Says I, cool as I could, "I don't mean to be before the mast all my life, Sir. I expect to be a captain some day."

And says old Blush, "A man with no advantages brought up to the sea might boast o' that; but you might have made a partner in ref'nm, Sir. You might have been a gentleman, and had as good a business in the dry-goods line as any man alive. And you've chose to be a sea-faring man. And I'll see my daughter in her grave before I'd give her to you."

Sum, sum we'll leave out."

That was the nigger just come aboard the parlor with the cool-hod. And when he said that my little scene began to look small, and I felt as if old Blush was on his back on the hearth-rug. They says I to the darkey, "Touch me if you want to, you rascal," and stalked out.

I saw Jenny on the sly next day and tried to get her to run away; but the girl had a will of her own, and knowed it. She wouldn't.

Says she, "I can't disobey my father, Jack. I love you dearly, and I'll never marry any one else; but I must be all good, and that's my lesson, I think ps would have released even if you hadn't been so violent; but now he never will. You've done it yourself, Jack, and I'm afraid you're blind, and looking away from me, "You liked the sea best, and you've got it instead of me."

Those were the last words she said; and I was going away when I heard her give a little cry, and, turning, saw her arms stretched out toward me. Then I went back and folded her in my bosom, and kissed her a hundred times. And I'm afraid I cursed her hard old father from the bottom of my soul, though I wasn't a bad sort, and a woman is a woman, and words good enough for other men's ears ain't to be spoken before her. The sight of Jenny as I left her, with her head down between her arms, and her tears dropping on the table, and her yellow hair like threads of gold, and her pretty figure all broke up into a row with some English soldiers. They'd all been drinking together, of course I took his part. They had threatened to fight with each other ten on each other. I didn't save Hamlin, for they shot him dead; but I got a couple of bullets in me, and was picked up just as much for dead. Jenny was a man ever was who didn't go into it. I got well again, but, as you may say, on the invalid list; and as I had a bit by a handful of money that I'd made lucky, I made up my mind to stay ashore and take care of Tom Hamlin's orphan children. He had two of them, both girls. Their mother died, and Jack fetched them home, poor half-starved creatures, for the woman they were boarded with was given to drink and kept them very short indeed; and so they told me I must, I got well again, and was all right—and settled down to be comfortable. Soon I looked out for a chaplain to pass Sunday as it ought to be; and the Rev. Eben Tooker, whom I knew handy, I shipped under him along with the girls, and as I always did my duty, never pretended not to see the plate when the steward shoved it my way. And so the Eben Tooker was a sociable man. He used to drop in evenings and talk to me about my soul; and though I can't say that I ever troubled him many times he bowed his duty when he did it. A captain's duty is one thing, and a chaplain's another.

So day by spoke about poor Hamlin's gals. She, he, "You send them to school, I hope." Says I, "I haven't done nothing of the sort; but the authorities turned their attention to the fearful state of those crowded dwellings, and the unwholesome atmosphere that surrounded them, and caused the cemetery to be finally closed. Alas! for too many that precaution came too late.

I was just Ballast at this time; and for two years had regularly attended the Reverend Ernest Pershyn's Sunday-school, as well as certain evening lectures organized by the same in our district. He was only a curate, and a very poor one; but so remarkable a man that, perhaps before I speak of what he did, I had better say something of what he was.

There are some human beings whom the Almighty has gifted with a strange power of leading their fellow-men, not by words alone, nor even example, but by some innate faculty that possess of which they themselves are often scarcely conscious. Mr. Penrhyn was one of these. - Simple, truthful, indescribably earnest, he never seemed to bestow a thought upon himself. His whole heart was in his work; and he gloried in that with a great pride—a most entire devotion. Early and late he was about it, scarcely seeming to feel fatigue. Wherever there was suffering or need there you found Jem, helping, advising, encouraging. He was the most cheery of human beings. I have seen other excellent clergymen, doing their work in a faithful spirit, but I never saw one who labored with such real love for his duty as he did. It was that love which kept him up, often under a degree of pressure that would have crushed many a stronger man. He had a young wife, who was indeed his helpmeet. The labors were ones heard to say that Mrs. Penrhyn was as good as two curates together; and he spoke the truth. She was sweet to look upon; with dark hair and eyes, and such blooming cheeks that reminded you of opening roses. Ha, on the contrary, was fair, somewhat pale, with kind blue eyes, golden hair, and a general delicacy of look that struck you painfully. He was about thirty-five at the time of which I speak; she some six years younger. I wish I could bring their pair before you as I used to see them—as I see them now. They were indeed lovely and pleasant in their outward appearance, and still more so in their lives.

I can hardly tell you how we boys loved Mr. Penrhyn—the master, as we called him. When first he came to that district there had been some unruly spirits who had tried to ridicule his efforts and his teaching; but he soon got the better of those, partly by firmness, partly by love. (He could be firm enough, and angry enough too, on occasion.) But now he had it all his own way in the school. You may see, we were so entirely convinced of his excellence, and that whatever he did was done out of a loving interest for our good, that we followed him blindly, as the young do follow a leader they both reverence and regard. And it was not only in the school-room that we saw him. At his lectures, his evening meetings, his visits at our homes, we were accustomed to speak to him freely and without reserve. He liked it. He used to say that his boys should consult him in every thing—their pleasures as well as their duties, and in time we did so, and became identified with him. Of course, he would take the same pains to mend a broken top for some sick child, or to teach a stupid boy how to spell, as he would to assist in the services entertaining, or the Christmas magic-lantern laughable. He was always trying to infuse a drop of happiness into every cup. No heart in the world ever contained more of the milk of human kindness.

I did not know till later how poor Mr. and Mrs. Penrhyn really were; but had their income been ever so large, they would always have shared it with those in need, for it was their habit to do so as well as nature to do so. A strong regard existed between them and my parents; and when father was laid up for a few fever, among many other acts, the master gave him far more than his proper share of time and attention. He nursed him like a brother, he soothed his dying ears with the consolations of the gospel. We did to remember that time of horror and misery—some so selfish in their terror—some so generous and self-denying. Night and day Mr. Penrhyn was up and about, where there was danger, and people were afraid to venture, there you might be sure to find him, watching, comforting, doing all that it was in the power of man to do. He was buried several days after I took sick, and he was the last person I saw before my fever. People said he brought hope and consolation in with him. His wife, too, who, for the children's sake, remained at home, was always preparing comforts for the sick; ready to give him a cheerful welcome and rest after his labors. I was only a few years a-prize from his labors, which was but seldom. Well, father died, as did many another round about us, and the work of the place carried forward. Betsy took ill too. Poor little thing! Though so young, she was as fond of the master as any of us. At the worst of times they always found a moment to give her a jump and a toss when he came to see us, and she would crow with delight when she heard his step. Betsy was the boy in mother's arms all fevered and helpless; and when the master, looking at her, gave a little smile it took the place of food.

"What, my Betsy had to?" she could just put out her little hand, and make shift to stroke his coat sleeve, and that was all. She died in his arms—our little baby Betsy—the pet of us all—that had been father's solace for many a month—she died, and when I looked on by his side in the grave and bear. Well, she was better with God than with us, as we had too good reason to feel before long.

Mr. Penrhyn, I reckon, could for months after in that fearful time; she said it wasn't in nature to see such an example as the master's and not try to follow it. There was one family near us named Steele, about one of whom (there were but three of them) I must now say something. My father and Philip Steele had been friends for years, and as children young Philip and I had been playmates; but when we two lads went to the master's school a spirit of rivalry sprang up between us, and a strong mutual dislike. He was a couple of years my senior, very handsome, and had a certain plausible way about him which made people like him. I, on the contrary, was naturally grave, taciturn, and reserved. You'll think it hard that I should master to say this, though he was far too wise and too just to betray it openly. Indeed, his quick eye having detected the truth, I felt that existed between us, more than once took us each to task for it. But he didn't succeed in making us love each other any the more for our mutual endeavors. Till his last dangerous attack of the fever, and by God's mercy brought him through, my heart didn't warm to him as it should have done had he allowed full trial to a numbers of the most robust were struck down in a moment, many who like mother, had been long ailing, were altogether spared. However, Mr. Tudor went, leaving his curates to do the work of the parish in that time of fear and of distress. And truly they did it too, never sparing themselves. But they were sadly overworked. One after another broke down under the strain; and one sultry afternoon, when the fever had quite disappeared from our court, it was whispered that Mr. Pershyn was down with it. Then mother locked up her own rooms, got a neighbor to take charge of ours, and set off to give what help she could to the master and his dear young wife.

She found him very bad: for a whole day and night the doctors despaired of him. But his day's work was not yet over. He rallied, and the moment he was fit to move he was ordered to the seaside, to try what change of air and rest would do for him.

Meanwhile I had not been improving in tempers and dispositions. My dislike to Philip Steele had increased in a determination I took no pains either to conceal or overcome. We were always tandying bad words—always on the verge of a furious outbreak. I was still that my mother should be harassed such a brute as I thought him; and he was equally savage at being continually reminded of the obligation. "I didn't want your mother!" he would say, glaring at me; "I didn't send for her. I wish she'd kept herself to herself, I'm sure!" "And I wish she had!" I once answered; "I wish you'd been let die in the fever—I do! and an excellent job too!"

The moment I had said it my conscience smote me. Was that the spirit my master had tried hard to teach me? But it was too late to unsay it; and for from the evil look in his eyes that he would not forget the speech.

After that generally comes famine—it proved so in our town. Never had there been such distress before. The unions were full to overflowing, and there was no room for any one to be got. Mother tried hard to earn enough for our support by taking in washing, and I helped her all I could. But, one by one, our little stocks of furniture went to pay for rent and food—not good wholesome meat, but dry bread, with which to keep body and soul together. Our mother's lifetime we had never known want; we had lived hard, but had never been without a sufficiency to satisfy hunger, and often something to spare for our poorer neighbors. But now times were changed. I never knew what it was to feel satisfied. I envied the meanest shop-boy who had a meal to down—the lowest actually in a gentleman's plentiful kitchen. Mr. Pershyn had promised to get me into some upholsterer's shop, where I might learn the trade thoroughly, of which father had already taught me a good deal; for he was a skilful workman. But my own wish was a desire in some family where I could be sure of food and clothing, and see something of the world besides. Now that Mr. Pershyn's return, who, we knew, would both advise and assist us.

Meanwhile, mother, who had resisted the terrible epidemic, began to sink under what seemed to be perpetual fever. She had never been strong, and the labor and privation she now underwent were more than she could bear. I did my duty by her as that sad time; but I couldn't save her, dying as she was for want of food and rest. One afternoon she was lying on her bed, which had but little clothing over left, while I was doing my best to complete her ironing. Her eyes were closed, and she breathed heavily, as I thought asleep; so that I was rather startled to hear her call me, "Clem! Clem!" in a weak voice, that yet sounded eager too. I ran to her with the iron still in my hand. "I am not down," said she, looking at me with a strange stare; "it don't matter now, my dear! Sit you here by me on the bed—I'll never trot on more. Clem! I an't long for this world, and I've seen such a deal of trouble in life that I'd be glad to go but for you. I would indeed," she cried, looking up wistfully; "I long to be 'where the wicked cease from trouble,' and the weary are at rest." There's little rest for the wicked, to be sure, on this side the grave; but there's rest for them with God. Oh, my dear! I've given a great privilege to you. I'll die happy if I could but see th' master, and tell him what's in my mind about my boy. And I'd like him to say a word there—just where you could see and hear those my eyes, as he did my old man's. Why is the dear master away?"

My heart felt dead within me. I couldn't cry. I could do nothing but stroke and kiss her hands. I couldn't realize losing her. It seemed to me impossible that I should be left there all alone—a helpless orphan of fifteen. I tried to say a prayer for her; but my tongue was parched, and I could scarce by speak the words. She did not hear them, seemed all strange and wandering. "I've such a longing for beef-tea," she said presently, fixing her eye on me with a hungry, eager gaze that reminded me of a starving dog I had once seen; "a cup o' th' master's beef-tea would do me such good now!"—she laughed a weak laugh. "And he'll get it, too, if it was the last drop he had in the house—I know he would."

I looked in the cupboard. There was a stale quarter of a loaf, and just a pinch of tea in a blue paper that was all. I made her a cup of the latter, and she sipped a little of it. "Ah! it an't like beef-tea, my dear!" she said, with a long shuddering sigh. "You'd best me up again, you'll try." I took my hand and kissed it. "Clem, my boy! you've been a good son to me, and you'll always do what th' master says, I know? He'll be a friend to you when I'm gone."

I threw myself on the bed and implored her not to talk so. I felt as if I should go mad. I felt I must endeavor to procure her some help, though I knew not how nor where. I got a poor widow whom she had been often good to (she was a kind soul was mother!) to come and stay in our room, and finish the ironing. Then I ran out, half crazy. It was just Christmas-time, and all the shops were full of provisions; every thing that could tempt a poor starving boy. I ran till I had reached a better quarter of the town than ours; then I stopped to take breath. I was near a large butcher's shop, about which there was quite a crowd of people, buying meat in the cold dim afternoon. There scarcely seemed enough shopmen to attend to so many. I stood there, idly watching, as one after another walked away provided. There was beef in plenty —beef that might save mother's life.

All at once, a woman standing near, who had been eagerly disputing with one of the shopmen about the price of a mutton-chop, turned it down and followed him to the other side of the counter. The meat fell on the pavement close by me. I stooped and picked it up, quick as lightning, came the wrong thought—the irresistible temptation. "Take it," the devil whispered, "and save your mother." I slipped it under my ragged coat, and trembling, shivering with excitement, think away unperceived. I give you my word I did not realize at the moment that I was stealing. I was absorbed in the unexpected delight of having obtained beef-tea for mother! I walked slowly away, not daring to look behind me. Suddenly a sound caught my ear—a fearful sound—"Stop him!" Could it—could it be me they were meaning? The sound was enough! I flew like an arrow from a bow, knowing nothing, thinking nothing but to escape from that horrible detection, which all at once came and glared at me like a spectre. I a thief! Madly I tore on; and as I turned the corner of a street I heard behind me. All the people were joining—following me! I saw them in that glimpse. And louder and louder came the cry, "Stop thief! stop thief!"

My brain seemed on fire—my heart ready to burst. Still I dashed on; till at last I came so violently against some one that I fell to the ground, and lay for an instant stunned. But I was up again immediately—up again, the blood streaming from my forehead, and I felt sober if possible than before. But that fall had given my pursuers an advantage; and now they were fast gaining upon me. There was no hope—no watch in my headlong flight, and some swelled the train. I heard them pressing close at my heels, and felt it was indeed all up. My mother would starve, have the meat away, and made one more convulsive effort—the effort of despair. It was the last. In another moment I was seized from behind, and blazing, glutsly to look upon, found myself in the grasp of a couple of stout policemen.

My cap was off—my face was covered with blood —I felt as though I should never get breath again, so violent had been my exertions; great pain in my side was a weakness. But I did not faint. I kept my senses, as dragged, borne along between these two powerful giants, I was conducted back to the scene of my butcher and his assistants, and a mob of the lowest description. And as we hurried past the corner of one street I heard a woman's voice I knew—a face pale, open-mouthed, horror-struck—that of a neighbor in our court. "Mercy save us!" I heard her cry, "it's Clem! Clem has took to thieving! Clem! Oh! what ever'll his poor mother do?" It'll be her death!"

I had fearful purposes of despair during the night. The idea of self-destruction was continually present to me. Again and again I asked myself if I were mad? I felt like it—I felt on the brink—I, so honest hitherto! Yes, I had done it.

Such offenses as mine had become fearfully frequent in that time of distress, that the magistrates were forced to be severe for the sake of example. I went into court with a sullen, dogged countenance. I saw the crowd of spectators, heard the strange words; but it was as though I neither saw nor heard, till one voice suddenly sounded in my ears; and then, indeed, I started to hear. I had seen it coming, and my whole soul was riveted in attention. Philip Steele was giving evidence against me.

Philip Steele had seen me standing by the butcher's stall, watching the customers as they came and went. He had seen me take up the meat (he did not say from the ground), conceal it under my coat, and hurry away. He had instantly informed the shopmen of the theft, and had joined in the pursuit after me. All this he told in a clear ringing voice, and with a boyish simplicity of manner, that at once assured belief. He was not aware of having done a heroic action, which he gave his evidence then, but for his prompt information of the theft at the time, I felt for the police would have escaped unsuspected, as no one but he had observed me take the meat, though many besides the policemen had seen me with it in my arms afterward.

This monster, whom my mother had won back from the very gates of death, had watched and betrayed the wretch I was. Any one, from all at once my strength gave way, my stubborn mood melted like snow before the fire. Stretching out my hands toward him, with an exceeding bitter and grievous cry, I shrieked out, "Master! master! I did take it!" But another was in my place, and I, a child, I had starved myself before ever I did this thing!"

CHAPTER II.

I WENT into prison an honest lad, honest at heart. In spite of the evil thing I had done. I came out of it a thief in intention and consent. I met with thieves there, men whose profession it was to steal, and I promised to become their pal. They told me of plenty of victuals to be had, and a joyous, exciting life: they told me that as an honest lad I was down on; that I might live for years, and refrain from dishonesty forever, but sooner or later my "trouble" would find me out, and drag me down again; they told me all this, and I believed and yielded to them, and became one of them.

So when the time came I shunk out of prison, meaning to betake myself to the place agreed upon with my new "pals," and then try to find out something about mother. But, as though he had all along read my thoughts, the master was standing as it were in the breach; and when, ashamed and angry, I strove to avoid him, he seized and held me fast. "No, Clem! you will come home with me—I must have you there. Sir!" I answered, savagely; "I'll never come to you again. It's no use —I won't." "You will!" he said, grasping me with a strong hand, as I struggled to release myself, having hies almost for his interference. "You will come, if only for your mother's sake."

He overruled me, as he always did. He had a strange power, that man—not to be resisted. He made me go with him; I was as well determined to give him the slip the very first opportunity; it would have nothing more to do with honesty or him. It didn't pay to be honest, and it did pay, I appeared, to be a thief. He led me into his house, keeping hold of me with that strong, earnest grasp of his, past his mouth, up into an empty garret. Then he looked the door, took the key, and releasing me, sat down.

"Clem," he said, in low, serious tones, "you have committed what in the eyes of men is an unpardonable fault; but God judgeth not as man judgeth. He knows your heart yet, and you shall be honest. Yes, hear me out. You are one of my boys—my sons, as I consider them; and I am answerable for you. I shall not be turned from good, I know—I know all your grief—your struggles—your temptation, but I will help you through all. Trust in me. You shall not be dragged down to vice and infamy while I live."

I was silent. I sat looking at him with fearless eyes—hard eyes, I doubt, I dealed myself against him. I would not be his again.

"Look at that bed," he continued; "it belongs to mother Gill—the poor old woman here, and the last words she uttered were a prayer for you—that you might be kept from the evil—that she might meet you again where all evil ceased from troubling, and the weary are at rest."

Her very words! Dead! Mother! Ah!

I hid my face.

"She never knew what—what you did. I thank God I was able to keep that secret grief from her. I brought her all the comforts I could have even taken, after my own return home, that she might be safe from the fever. Clem, she died full of peace—happy—blessing you—praying that you might keep honest, as she had done. And she left you this ring."

He took from his pocket mother's wedding-ring and held it out to me.

"But listen, Clem: to it you you shall promise me to be honest for her sake. Clem, perhaps she sees you now! Who knows?"

It was no use. I could not resist him. I was like wax in his hands. Before we quitted that garret I told him all—all my piteous tale—the way in which the devil had overpowered me—and I left the despair afterward—the indifference—the falling away and consent to a life of sin. And I had promised to give up all, and be honest, and to be dear all, not for her sake alone, whom I should see no more on earth, but for his, who in her absolute bereavement had taken her to his own home and been unto her as a son.

And into his own home he now took me too. He said it was the best way to shield me from the first bitter consequences of my own act. He said that when the others saw he trusted, he forgave me, they would be slow to do the same, and no one would dare reproach or mock me in his presence. So I ate of his bread and drank of his cup, sleeping in the same room where my mother died, mourning for her with many tears; doing what I could, in my poor way, to serve the good man who had lost everything in me, loving him with an unspeakable affection; learning more and more every day of his wondrous excellence of heart and life. I was in the school of grace and happy learning, in spite of the many mortifications from which, do what he would, he could not shield me. I throve with extreme sensitiveness from all contact with the outer world; dreading the sight of every familiar face; sneering even at the scorn I too often met with, and, worst of still, the cold avoidance with which too many passed me by. Gladly would I have shut myself up in his sheltering walls—but this he would not suffer. I must be brave, he said, and meet manfully what I had brought on myself. I must live down the misconceptions—overcome evil opinion. The first shock of the moral shower-bath was bad enough; but each moment came it seemed to lose all those curious eyes, bear with the thousand slights that met me at every turn; to start and shiver under any chance allusion from others, and to such details as must be born; to suffer at every moment unheard-of pangs, yet keep a calm face. It was a sore trial, but he upheld me through all. His kind eye was ever on me; his voice had a peculiar gentleness when he addressed me; in a thousand ways he sought to show his boys that he trusted, loved, hoped in me yet. I know not then, but I learned long afterward, how he had written to them all of my return, appealing to them for his sake, to be forbearing toward an erring brother, who had bitterly repented of his sin.

And at home the gentle lady vied with her husband in showing me confidence. I helped their solitary maid-servant all I could, thus preparing myself for a page's place when the master should find one for me. One day he was talking to a brother-artist about me, and urging him to try and get me one. I was minding the baby—as they still called their sweet two-years-old boy—who had grown quite fond of me now, and would cry after me when I left the room.

"And you're not afraid to recommend him?

You think you're wise to trust that boy?" Mr. Steadsel said, glancing at me sideways with an expression of mingled doubt and surprise.

I paused in my jumping of the little fellow, and listened breathless for the reply. I hated Mr. Greathed for his distrust.

"Afraid!" my master cried, turning also, and meeting my eyes with that frank, cheery glance of his. "No, I haven't a particle of fear. And I don't think—I know I'm wise to trust him."

How I hated him for his generous confidence in me! How with a great inward sob I said to myself that I would never, never betray it!

I have said that he was urged his boys to talk to him. In that way I now learned much of his inner life and heart. Often, after a long day's labor, he had retired to his study at bedtime-hour, when I brought in his bottle of fresh water the last thing at night, he would push aside a half-finished lecture or sermon, turn to the fire, and say, with a brisk, kindly voice, "Now, Clem, my boy! I've just half an hour for you. What is it you got to say or to ask?" Once, as he sit in front to forget gether the remains of the nearly extinguished fire, I was struck with the unusual weariness of his look.

"You seem very tired, Sir!" I said.

"I am tired," he replied; "leg weary and brain weary. You see I'm not quite the man I was before I had that fever, Clem, my boy!"

"Why do you work so hard, Sir? You wear yourself out."

"Better that than rusting out, surely."

"But I don't see what you gain by it. It don't seem to make you any richer."

He smiled one of his own radiant smiles. "No," he cried, still trying to collect the scattered embers, "not in one sense, certainly. I'm poor enough; so poor that I don't dare to use any more of those coals, for here should run short to-morrow. But we'll have a little warmth, nevertheless." And going out briskly, he presently returned with a few pieces of wood in his arms, with Glass painted on it in large letters. "That'll do!" he said, cheerily, with quite a loyalish pleasure, as after a while a bright flame leaped up, over which he spread his thin hands, shivering, but cheery as ever. "That's a capital! Now, Clem, you asked me why I worked so hard, when it don't seem to make me richer. Well—why did you give up all thought of thieving lately?"

I shuddered. Scarcely could I bear an allusion to that horror, even from him. I hung my head, and answered, "Out of love to you, Sir. And out of gratitude."

"Exactly—to your master. And I work hard for the same reason—out of love and gratitude to mine. And the boys in—who are to other master gives—not gold, better than that—"

"What then, Sir?"

"Heavenly peace! hope! love! all those! Real riches."

You can no more imagine the expression of his face as he uttered those words than I can describe it. When he spoke of his Master he glanced upward, as though seeing Him, and his countenance became great, serious, full of adoration. I had much consothing of the same look in him before; when excited by the subject on which he was preaching he carried all his audience with him, and drew them from many eyes. But in a few minutes he was his own cheery self again, full of interest about me, whom he had in a measure forgotten before.

"Clem, I have a question to put to you."

"Yes, Sir."

"Have you forgiven Phil?"

I paused a moment before I replied. Then I said boldly, "No, Sir; and never shall!"

I ought to mention that he had often put this question to me before, and I had always returned the same answer.

"I thought you would do any thing for my sake."

"So I would—any thing but that, Sir. I shall never forgive Philip Steele. I had rather prevent you to give up the revenge I once thought of, and that should be enough."

"No, it is not enough. I must have the forgiveness too."

"Sir, the other day you asked me the same question, and I neither made a vow that I would never forgive Philip."

"Clem, you tell me that—"

"I didn't make it, Sir; but I could have done so. You see I don't wish to forgive him. He is base, ungrateful, cowardly. He returned my mother evil for good. I never will forgive him!"

There was a pause. He sat looking at the fire in silence. "Clem," said he, after some time, "I shall grieve if this is your last word. Perhaps it was too soon to do so at all. But mark my words, sitting watching that flame—you must forgive Phil."

As if to give additional effect to his words the flame went suddenly out.

I felt miserable. I believed in him implicitly; but I could not give up my resentment. It seemed to me wrong to do so. It was like giving up a limb to it. Cherished it. I would keep it in spite of him.

The more was said at that time; but some days later, as I was "minding the baby," he paused to watch us both, and said, "It's pleasant, isn't it, Clem, to see how fond he is of you?"

I looked up, all my heart in my eyes. "It is indeed, Sir."

"But it is a better pleasure to serve those one hates; for then we must cease to hate them. No one can go on hating those they benefit; it is not in our human nature. So, if a man who harbors resentment against another for some great injury, were to ask me how he should set about getting rid of that resentment, I should say, 'Be good to him serve him, pray for him. You'll find you have forgiven him after that.'"

He spoke with a great earnestness, a solemnity, even that impressed his words upon my mind. But I didn't conquer me. Do good to Phil Steele! pray for him! I would die sooner. Rather I would give the world to crush him, as he had crushed me.

THE SCOUT.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

THE SCOUT.

We call the attention of our readers to the sketch engraved on the preceding page. No feature connected with our military operations is so interesting or so abundant in thrilling incident as what is called the secret service. This has been especially the case in the West. For the most part the details of this service have been hidden from the public. It was necessary that it should be, both for the success of important movements and for the sake of the gallant heroes engaged in this branch of the service. This veil of secrecy has covered in temporary obscurity the most romantic incidents of the war—incidents, too, upon which oftentimes the fate of battles has hung. These will some time be made known, and will form an interesting portion of the history of this war, relieving the tedious details of marches and manœuvres.

GENERAL HAZEN.

We give on this page a portrait of Brevet Major-General WILLIAM B. HAZEN, the hero of Fort M'Allister. General HAZEN is a native of Vermont, from which State he was appointed to the Military Academy at West Point, where he graduated in 1855, with the brevet rank of Second Lieutenant. He entered the war in November, 1861, as Colonel of the Forty-first Ohio Regiment. This regiment was afterward attached to PALMER'S division of the Army of the Cumberland, in which General HAZEN commanded a brigade from January, 1862. This was the Nineteenth Brigade, of NELSON'S old division, and which had marched with that General to Shiloh, followed him to Corinth, and through the summer campaign in Western Tennessee, Mississippi, and Alabama, and afterward had participated in the Kentucky campaign in the fall of 1862. General HAZEN took an important part in the battle of Murfreesborough, or Stone River, on the right of ROSECRANS'S left wing. His brigade held an important position in that battle, and but for his persistent defense the partial disaster of the 31st of December would have been turned into defeat. General HAZEN commands a division of the Fifteenth Corps.

FROM SAVANNAH.

We give on this page, and on pages 88 and 89, several interesting sketches from our special artists in Savannah. Soon after the Federal occupation of the city General SHERMAN gave the citizens the privilege of staying quietly at home or of taking their departure for some other point in the Confederacy. Accordingly, those who were not disposed to remain under the protecting folds of the old flag were quietly ordered to take passage on the steamer S. R. Spaulding. Captain AUDENRIED, of General SHERMAN'S staff, had charge of the flag of truce that was to take them through.

General SHERMAN has instituted careful reviews of his entire army previous to its entrance upon a new campaign. General BARRY conducted the review of the artillery, which is in a splendid condition. The cavalry under KILPATRICK is pronounced fit for any service.

The campaign upon which General SHERMAN has entered is of stupendous proportions, and the resistance to be overcome will probably be very great.

GENERAL WAGNER.

THE country has not forgotten the heroes of the Battle of Franklin, fought November 30, 1864. Prominent among these was Brigadier-General G. D. WAGNER. The line of battle, it will be remembered, was formed by General SCHOFIELD so as to cover Franklin. The Fourth Corps under STANLEY held the right, and the Twenty-third under Cox the left: WAGNER'S brigade, of the Twenty-fourth, connected with RILEY'S of the Fourth, forming the centre. It was against this point that the rebel army under HOOD directed its most impetuous charges. Our readers remember how WAGNER and RILEY met these repeated charges, until, overborne by superior numbers, they fell back; and how, being reinforced, they again recovered their ground, taking a large number of prisoners. General WAGNER entered the war as Colonel of the Fifteenth Indiana Volunteers, and gained great distinction in the West Virginia campaign, in the autumn of 1861.

CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTER FROM A SOLDIER.

THE world's ear is full of cries from the shadowland of rebel barbarism, where suffering and death sit at every prison-door, and starvation walks at the side of every captive. Thousands of true hearts at the North have bled at the recital of the horrors of the Libey, of Andersonville, Danville, and Salisbury; and far lands, looking across the ocean, have shuddered as the spectacle of rebel barbarity developed before their eyes, wondering how, in a Christian land, such things could be. It is perhaps an old story now; but if you will let me, I will tell you what I have seen and felt and know of slaveholders' mercy while yet the touch of their fierce cruelty is upon me.

My introduction into the living death at Andersonville occurred on the 7th of July last, and I remained in its clutch until the 23d of October following. In all that period not one element of comfort illuminated the misery of our bondage. The camp embraced thirty acres, surrounded by a stockade twelve feet high. Here during the month of August 30,000 prisoners were crowded together like cattle, for the most part without any shelter whatever from the heat or frequent rains. At night, during rainy weather, they lay on the ground in groups, remaining thus until morning, wet to the skin, and with no fire to dry their scanty clothing. Occasionally the days were intensely hot, followed by rainy nights, inducing necessarily sickness among all except the more robust, the want of proper food predisposing the system to disease. The daily fare consisted of less than a pint of meal, four spoonfuls of rice, three spoonfuls of beans, and two ounces of bacon; sometimes, however, only a part of these articles were received, and then in a changed state. A favorite dish consisted in taking a pint of meal, mixing it with water, and making it into dumplings about the size of an egg, which were boiled with pieces of bacon of the size of marbles until they floated on the top of the soup thus made. Then taking out the dumplings, we cut them open and poured in the soup—having thus a dish which to us was a luxury, though in other times we would not have insulted our palates by offering them such a "mess." Sometimes we made coffee by burning pieces of corn-bread, and boiling it in the soup, drinking the product, of course, without either sugar or milk. At other times, in the absence of other food, we dug up roots and ate them.

There being no sanitary regulations in the camp, and no proper medical provisions, sickness and death were inevitable accompaniments of our imprisonment. Thousands of the prisoners were so afflicted with scurvy that their limbs were ready to drop from their bodies. I have seen the maggots scooped out by the handful from the sores of these sufferers. I have seen others, mere skeletons, watched by disease, dying by inches, with not an ounce of medicine, nor a hand lifted any where among those in charge of the camp for their relief. On one occasion, when a physician gave notice that he would examine a portion of the sick men, over three thousand poor wretches, scarcely able to crawl, appeared before him; some carried on stretchers, and others in blankets, carried by comrades. Many lay before the physician in the last throes of death; and several, who were taken up alive, were corpses before reaching the point appointed for the examination, which, after all, amounted only to an inspection. On another occasion a gang of men were employed two hours and a half in carrying out the dead from a section of the camp known as the Lospital. On one day in August no less than one hundred and sixty prisoners died, and the average was about ninety deaths daily. From the 1st of March to the 16th of September sixteen thousand Federal soldiers, prisoners of war, were carried from that camp to the dead-man's trench and the felon's burial! The method of burial was usually as follows:

REBEL WOMEN LEAVING SAVANNAH.—[SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

The dead were gathered up by detachments of the prisoners, and carried outside of the stockade, where they were laid in a row under a cluster of trees. Thence the bodies were carried in wagons, into which they were thrown at random, to a ditch at some distance from the camp, where they were tumbled out, covered with a thin layer of earth, and so left. Many a brave and loyal soldier of the Republic, who had won honorable scars in the battle's van, found that his last burial of a dog at rebel hands.

But our tormentors did not confine their cruelty to starving us of proper food and medical attendance. They had another devil's device for maiming and, ultimately, "THE DEATH BLOW." This line consisted of a row of stakes driven into the ground—with boards fastened on the top—at a distance of about fifteen feet from the stockade on the inner side. This line was closely watched by a guard, and any prisoner who approached it—and many often unconsciously did, and so, in the crowd, was often unavoidable—was instantly shot dead. Frequently the guard fired indiscriminately into a crowd, so one occasion I saw one man killed and another wounded, both of whom were innocent and standing some distance from the line. There was a standing order that any prisoner who killed a Union soldier for approaching the Dead Line should receive a furlough for two months; and, for wounding a soldier, a furlough for one month. The order not only offered a premium for murder, but encouraged the guard in other outrages, against which we had no defense whatever.

Perhaps you wonder what we did in the long days and nights of our imprisonment? What could we do? Crowd thirty thousand sick, starving, dying men into a space of thirty acres, and what opportunity is there for any thing but suffering? In all our camp there were but two streets—"Broadway" and "Market"—called them—neither over ten feet wide. Even if it was impossible, even had we been disposed, to indulge in games or amusements of any athletic nature in avenues like these, about which, lying on one or under the stockade, the most we could be seen, pale and ghastly, at any hour of the day or night. What did we do? We talked of home; of wives, mothers, and sisters, upon whose faces we did not expect, many of us, ever to look again; talked dreadly of battles past and woes to come. What else thinking and doing at home? Do they miss us, and long for our coming? Are they all still among the living? These were the questions we debated with ourselves and with one another. But chiefly we talked of our daily fare; dwelling with childish pleasure upon the scanty meals which more nearly satisfied our clamoring appetites. The nearer we came to starvation the more we thought of food, and daintily dissected, during for ourselves feasts of all toothsome things in the day when relief should come; counting up on our fingers the many substantials and delicacies with which our palates should be regaled in that coming time.

At length, on the 27th of October, an order came for the removal of all but six thousand of the prisoners from Andersonville to Millen. How hope stirred within us at the good news! How all blessed to go! How the pallid faces of the dying grew paler still when, begging to be removed, they were told they must remain! Remain to die—to die away from home and friends, with no soft hand to smooth the rough way into the rest that is starless! No more hope for us! Hope and dainty fare grew bright at the prospect of deliverance! How scores of weak, suffering ones dragged themselves into line, and, with painful steps and slow, passed out to join the company of the chosen! More than one poor fellow, whose sufferings had won my pity, and whose patience had made me feel for him as a brother, I left behind me that fair autumn day; but their faces had grown dim in the quiet nights, and their sobbing good-by sound yet in my ears.

At Millen we remained four weeks, and were then conveyed to Savannah for exchange. I shall never forget the feeling that overwhelmed me when, for the first time in months, I saw the old flag again—the dear old flag under which I had so often fought—for which I was ready to die in honorable battle. How we cried when we found ourselves under its folds on the deck of a loyal ship! How we sank down in groups and talked softly one with another of home and friends, and wondered whether, now that the fighting was all so changed for war which we had, we should really reach and enjoy it!

Well, we hoisted anchor and sailed out upon the pure, fresh sea breeze at last to Annapolis, a sick, ruined, emaciated company. There kind hands received us, kind welcome cheered us, and we knew that we were home at last—home, with the arms of a great nation around us, sheltering and sustaining us with the great love of a noble, loyal heart.

When I left the camp at Millen my apparel consisted only of a blouse, pants, and shoes. Many had not even the blouse; some were without shoes; all were ragged, lean, and wretched. But Father Abraham's children had said since then—those of us who are left—with the loyal blue, and, God willing, we will wear it again in the battle's front, as, under the old flag, we, with the Cross, keep marching on!

THE MONITOR "MONADNOCK."

THE Monitor Monadnock, a sketch of which we give on page 81, is one of our most efficient ironclads. She is 1564 tons, and mounts four 15-inch guns. She was built at the Boston Navy-yard, and has two turrets. Her length is 259 feet 6 inches, her breath 55 feet, with a depth of hold of 12½ feet. She was launched March 25, 1864. Admiral Porter, alluding in one of his official reports to this vessel, says:

"She could ride out a gale at anchor in the Atlantic Ocean. She is certainly a perfect success so far as the steering machinery and her command is concerned, and is only defective in some minor details, which, in the building of these vessels, require the superintendence of a thorough seaman and a practical and ingenious man. The Monadnock is capable of crossing the ocean alone (when her companions are once adjusted properly), and could destroy any vessel in the French or British navy, lay their towns under contribution, and return again [provided she could pick up coal] without fear of being followed. She could certainly clear any harbor on our coast of the blockaders in case we were at war with a foreign power."

The Monadnock Admiral Porter thinks inferior to the Canonicus in the Kennebec river, carrying less guns; and yet, he says, the latter would be no match for the former in a fight, as the Monadnock has the greater speed.

BURNING OF THE SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTE.

On the afternoon of January 24, at about three o'clock, a fire broke out in the Smithsonian Institute building in the left dome. Its picture-gallery, between the ceiling and the roof. The fire is supposed to have been occasioned by a defective flue. It was a long time before the ceiling fell in, and the picture-gallery was in a sheet of flame. The conflagration was nearly altogether confined to the main building and above the first story, in which was the museum. Unfortunately, the latter was considerably damaged by water. The wings were not much harmed, as the library, which they contain, containing over one hundred thousand volumes, was uninjured.

The loss by the fire includes the lecture room, the philosophical laboratory with most of the instruments, the originals of private records, and the archives of the institution, together with the destruction of the pictures in the gallery. About two hundred of these paintings were here, of which only five or six were saved.

The Smithsonian Institute is located south of Pennsylvania avenue, in the immediate rear of several of the Capitol, in the midst of a beautiful park. The building is of red standstone, 450 feet front by 140 in depth. The cost of the building and grounds was more than $300,000.

The Institution was founded by JAMES SMITHSON, an Englishman of large fortune, who died, also, in 1826, bequeathed his property to the United States. The property, amounting to half a million of dollars, came into the possession of the Government in 1835, and eleven years after the Smithsonian Institute was organized on the basis of a plan recommended by JOHN QUINCY ADAMS and others. The President, Vice-President, and Cabinet, the Chief Justice, the Commissioner of Patents, and the Mayor of Washington form the board of directors.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE WAR GOES BRAVELY ON!

The war has now lasted about twelve years. "To put in mildly," says the astonished reader, "that's a big number!" So it is; but it spins like a mutton jack at that. It is not the war against Dunston sugar by our armies, but for it with pocket-handkerchiefs and fragrant cologne, waged by HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS, that is here referred to.

During all these years this most potent of all medicinal PEOPLE'S FRIENDS and BENEFACTORS has been directing its Samaritan work—ongchasing the STOMACHS, indigestion, and NERVES, pursuing them to the lair of FEEBLE and the SICK.

All this would be invaluable as a means of defending the system against the effects of exposure to cold and damp, and of preventing the fatal consequences resulting from over-heated rooms into a frigid temperature.

Use it, and you will avoid severe colds, aching, irregularities of the bowels, affections of the liver, and nervous prostration.

If you labor under any of these afflictions, still use it; for it will relieve and cure you.

Avoid all the adulterated stimulants. Remember that HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS is the only true, purifying vegetable TONIC, ALTERATIVE, and RESTORATIVE. Sold every where. Be sure and get the genuine.

"THE PEN IS MIGHTIER THAN THE SWORD."
THE GOLD PEN—THE BEST OF ALL PENS,
MORTON'S GOLD PENS,
THE BEST PENS IN THE WORLD.

On receipt of any of the following sums in Cash, the Subscriber will send, by return mail, or otherwise, as directed, a Gold Pen or Pens—selecting the same according to description, viz.:

GOLD PENS WITHOUT CASES.

For 50 cents, the Mayflower; for 75 cents, the Lucky Pen; for $1 00, the Always-Ready Pen; for $2 25, the Little Pet; for $3 00, the Excelsior Pen.—These Pens are as a numbers, but correspond in sizes to Numbers 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 Pens.

THE SAME PENS IN SILVER-PLATED EXTENSION CASES WITH PENCILS.

For $1 00, the Magic Pen; for $1 25, the Lucky Pen; for $1 50, the Always-Ready Pen; for $2 00, the Elegant Pen; and for $2 50, the Excelsior Pen.

These are Gold-Finished, Good-Writing Gold Pens, with Iridosmine Points, that will wear at every one of which will far outlast a gross of the best steel Pens; although they are unsurpassed for smoothness, elasticity, and capabilities.

MORTON'S WARRANTED PENS.

The name "A. Morton," "Number," and "Quality," are stamped on the following Pens, and the points are warranted for Three Months, except accident.

The Numbers indicate size only: No. 1 being the smallest, 6 the largest, adapted for the pocket; No. 4 the smallest, and No. 10 the largest Mammoth Gold Pen, for the desk.

Long and Medium Nibs of all sizes and qualities. Short Nibs of Nos. 3, 4, and 5 Pens, and made only of first quality.

The Long and Short Nibs are fine pointed: the Medium Nibs are Broad. Fine Points and Broad Points. The engravings are fac-similes of the sizes and styles.

GOLD PENS WITHOUT CASES.

For $1 25 a No. 2 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 3 Pen, 3d quality.

For $1 50 a No. 3 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 3 Pen, 3d quality; or a No. 4 Pen, 5d quality.

For $1 75 a No. 3 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 4 Pen, 3d quality; or a No. 5 Pen, 5d quality.

For $2 00 a No. 4 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 5 Pen, 3d quality; or a No. 6 Pen, 5d quality.

For $2 50 a No. 4 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 6 Pen, 3d quality; or a No. 8 Pen; $4 50 a No. 7 Pen; $5 75 a No. 8 Pen; $8 50 a No. 9 Pen; $7 00 a No. 10 Pen—all 1st quality.

THE SAME GOLD PENS, IN SILVER EXTENSION CASES WITH PENCILS.

For $2 00 a No. 1 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 3 Pen, 3d quality.

For $2 50 a No. 3 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 5 Pen, 3d quality; or a No. 6 Pen, 5d quality.

For $3 00 a No. 3 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 4 Pen, 3d quality; or a No. 5 Pen, 5d quality.

For $3 75 a No. 4 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 5 Pen, 3d quality; or a No. 6 Pen, 5d quality.

For $4 50 a No. 5 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 6 Pen, 3d quality.

For $5 75 a No. 6 Pen, 1st quality.

GOLD PENS, ALL FIRST QUALITY, IN SILVER-MOUNTED GUARD-HOLDERS.

For $2 75 a No. 4 Pen; for $3 25 a No. 5 Pen; for $4 00 a No. 6 Pen; for $5 00 a No. 8 Pen.

For $7 a No. 8 Pen; for $8 a No. 9 Pen; and for $9 a No. 10 Pen.

The "1st Quality" are pointed with the very best Iridosmine Points, and the "3d Quality" and those of this quality are sold with the slightest imperfection which skill and the closest scrutiny can detect.

The "2d Quality" are superior to any Pens made by him previous to the year 1860.

The "3d Quality" he intends shall equal in respect to Durability, Elasticity, and Good Writing Qualities (the only true considerations) any Gold Pens made elsewhere.

In regard to the Gold Pens, he begs leave to say that previous to operating his New and Patented Machines, he had made Gold Pens for the Trade, and Retailed Pens, for the Price, had the Gold been furnished gratuitously.

Parties ordering must in all instances specify the Number or "Name" of "Number," and "Quality" of the Pens wanted, and be particular to describe the kind they prefer, whether Fine Point or Broad Point.

All remittances sent by mail in registered letters are at my risk; and I will also refund to every one charge for registering, in addition to the price of goods ordered. I will guarantee them safely delivered.

Parties sending Gold or Silver will be allowed the full premium for the same, currently.

TO CLUBS.—A discount of 10 per cent. will be allowed to Clubs ordering Pens to the value of $25, and 20 per cent. on $40, if sent to one address at one time.

THIRTY YEARS' RESEARCH.

The discoverer of the celebrated

Brandreth's Pills

did not decide upon their composition until after thirty years of experiment and research into the medicinal properties of the numerous plants composing the vegetable kingdom—his object being to compose a medicine which might exert the most perfect safety, and would thoroughly take out impurities from the blood. The universal success which has attended this medicine sufficiently proves how completely this object has been attained. They have restored millions to health who were pronounced incurable by their physicians.

ARCANA WATCH.

An Elegant Novelty in Watches.

The cases of this watch are an entirely new invention, composed of six different metals, rolled togeth r and plated, producing an exact imitation of 18-carat gold, called Arcana, which will never change in color. They are as beautiful and durable as solid gold, and are offered at one-eighth the cost. The case is beautifully designed, with panel and fluted centre, with patent push-pendant, and engraved in the exact style of the celebrated Gold Hunting Cases, and are highly handsome, durable, and at so cost an imitation of gold as to defy detection. The movement is manufactured by the well-known St. Imier Watch Co. of Europe, and are superbly finished, having engraved patent, full jewelled, fine carved bridges, the Geneva escapement chain action, adjusting regulator, gold balance, with electric steel hair spring, and is altogether a good time-piece. These watches are of three different sizes, the smallest being for ladies, and are all hunting cases. A case of either will be sent by mail or express for $15.0. A single one sent in an elegant morocco case for $25. Will readily sell for three times their cost. We are the sole agents for this watch in the United States, and will loose no private watch do not bear our trade-mark. Address DEVAUGH & CO.,

15 Maiden Lane, New York.

In consequence of the great stagnation of trade in the manufacturing districts of England, through the war having cut off the supply of cotton, the impoverished Watch-ble Jewelry, originally intended for the English market, has been sent to this country for sale in this and MUST BE SOLD AT ANY SACRIFICE!

Under these circumstances, ARNANDALE & CO., acting as Agents for the principal European Manufacturers, have received the following Jewelry, subject to the following regulations:

Cartificates, stating each article and its value, are placed in Sealed Envelopes, and well mixed. One of these envelopes will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of 25 cents.

ALL ARTICLES SOLD AT ONE DOLLAR EACH, WITHOUT REGARD TO VALUE.

On receipt of the Certificate you will see what you are going to have, and then it is at your option to send the Dollar and have what is named, or to return it and have obtain a Gold Watch, Diamond Ring, or any Set of Jewelry in the list for ONE DOLLAR, and in no case can they get less than One Dollar's worth, so there are no blanks. The price of Certificates is as follows:

One for 25 cents; five for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; and one for $10; one hundred for $30.

Agents will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate sold. Being, from their experience, worth more than One Dollar. Agents will collect 18 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, which includes our postage stamps.

In consequence of the great stagnation of trade in the manufacturing districts of England, through the war having cut off the supply of cotton, an impoverished Watch-ble Jewelry, originally intended for the English market, has been sent for sale in this country, and MUST BE SOLD AT ANY SACRIFICE!

Under these circumstances, ARNANDALE & CO., acting as Agents for the principal European Manufacturers, have received the following Jewelry, subject to the following regulations:

Certificates, stating each article and its value, are placed in Sealed Envelopes, and well mixed. One of these envelopes will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of 25 cents.

ALL ARTICLES SOLD AT ONE DOLLAR EACH, WITHOUT REGARD TO VALUE.

On receipt of the Certificate you will see what you are going to have, and then it is at your option to send the Dollar and have what is named, or to return it and have obtained a Gold Watch, Diamond Ring, or any Set of Jewelry in the list for ONE DOLLAR, and in no case can they get less than One Dollar's worth, so there are no blanks. The price of Certificates is as follows:

One for 25 cents; five for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; and one for $10; one hundred for $30.

Agents will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate sold. Being, from their experience, worth more than One Dollar. Agents will collect 18 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, which includes our postage stamps.

Munro's Ten Cent Novel, No. 31, ROLLING THUNDER;

OR, THE RIVAL WAR CHIEFS.

By George W. Robinson.

This is a story of early life on the banks of the Ohio. The combat between two rival tribes, headed by their warlike chiefs, is described with a grandeur and interest that can not be surpassed, and seldom equaled, while the "Upper Ten" scenes of love scrapes, interspersed with the finest specimens of Irish wit, render this novel one of the most laughable as well as one of the most exciting that can be imagined. The following is a list of the Ten Cent Novels already published, and for sale by country: No. 1. The Hunters. 2. The Trapper's Retreat. 3. The Trapper's Betrothed. 4. The Red Rangers. 5. The Trail of Fire. 6. The Man-Eaters. 7. Charlotte S. The Track of Fire. 6. The Man-Eaters. 7. Charlotte Temple. 8. The Death Track. 9. The Scalp Hunters. 10. The Tiger of the Ocean. 11. The Hunter's Triumph. 12. The Trapper's Daughter. 13. The Scout. 14. Jack Sherman, the Lion-hearted Scout. 15. The Scourge of the Ocean. 16. The Trapper's Bride. 17. The Indian Queen. 18. The Demon of the Woods. 18. The Wild Scout of the Ocean. 19. The Trapper's Escape. 20. The Rollicking Rangers. 21. Rattlesnake Dick; or, the Flower of the Hacienda. 22. Kenton the Borderer. 23. The Pioneers of the Prairie; or, The Slasher of the Cave. 24. The Robber's Track. 25. Joe Ro, the Hunter. 26. Longfellow, the Scout. 27. The Giant Spy of Bunker Hill. 28. Sea Cook, the Wild Half-Breed. 29. Squid-Eyed Sam, the Sunkey Sandyrat.

The subscription is so nearly completed that it is intended to close the same on or before the 15th of February.

Subscriptions, $750,000, of which $600,000 purchases the land—in all, 67,360 acres. The remaining $150,000 is the permanent cash working capital of the Company.

Capital stock, $5,000,000. Par value of shares, $100. Subscribers to this purchase will receive eight shares of stock for each one hundred dollars subscribed. Lands located on the Little Kanawha and Elk Rivers, in the counties of Gilmer and Braxton, in the very heart of the oil regions of West Virginia.

Professor Richard Owen reports: "Your property is the very centre of the West Virginia oil region. It has tolerment and gas springs along the banks of its streams, one of which vies with the famous 'Burning Spring' itself."

Professor Shepherd, of New Haven, Conn., reports: "I consider it eminently oil-producing land. The oil-bearing shales underlie it extensively, and the long lines of carbonated hydrogen, or illuminating gas springs, many of which I saw burning, as well as the appearance of oil itself on the surface of the tract, fully confirms me in this belief.

"There can be no doubt that along your creeks and tributaries there is a large extent of mineable oil-producing territory. The prodigious amount of bituminous and canuel coal, iron ore, limestone, and fire-clays embedded in the hills of your property, the gas and oil springs of which are covered with an extraordinary growth of white oak and other heavy timber, all increase the value of your property."

These views are fully indorsed by the reports of the most practical and experienced men from the oil-districts of both Pennsylvania and Virginia.

The Company consider them-dves fortunate in having secured the services of Mr. Blackwell, a gentleman of experience, for the general superintendency, so well known as the late Chief Engineer and Superintendent of the "Commissioners of Washington Heights" New York City.

Arrangements are in rapid progress for the immediate development of the property on a scale commensurate with its value and extent.

Subscriptions payable at the time of subscribing, or one-half in cash, the balance in thirty days from the time of closing the subscription, can be made to any person or bidder at the office of the undersigned, 61 Cedar Street, New York; J. K. DOBSON, No. 42 State Street, Boston; and JOHN W. STRONG, Detroit, Michigan, where full information can be obtained.

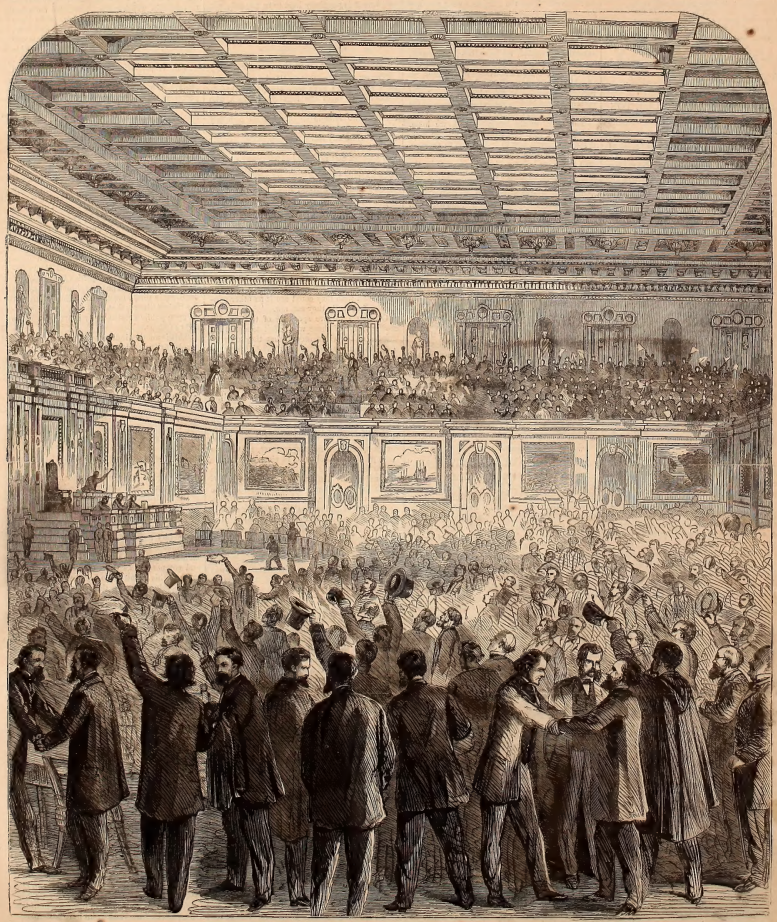
Beaucke

In these cases of scanty, re-tarded growth, baldness, or premature gray hair, the Beaucke Hair Restorative is found to be a most valuable remedy. Its tonic properties are unequaled, and its use is followed by a new growth of hair, which retains its natural color. Sold by druggists generally. Depot, 493 Broadway, New York.

Beaucke's Hair Restorative



Is the most wonderful discovery of the age. It is a scientific preparation of Sarsaparilla, Burdock, Yellow Dock, Sage, Nettle, Wintergreen, Quinine, Cantharides, Glycerine, Jamaica Rum, Bay Rum, Lavender, Rosemary, Alcohol, Rose Water, Distilled Water, Sulphur, Iodine, Iodide of Potassium, Nitrate of Silver, Sulphate of Quinine, Sulphate of Zinc, Sulphate of Copper, Sulphate of Iron, Sulphate of Morphine, Sulphate of Strychnine, Sulphate of Atropine, Sulphate of Veratrine, Sulphate of Aconitine, Sulphate of Digitaline, Sulphate of Conine, Sulphate of Hyoscyamine, Sulphate of Belladonna, Sulphate of Stramonium

FREE AMERICA.

A shout of joy is ringing through the land,
And each long bowed and broken rite and stand,
As if uplifted by God's bared right hand—
Our country shall be free!

The great decree unfolds the final deed;
No doubtful future clues remind our need;
The blessed fruit hangs ripe within the seed—
Our country is free!

Our mighty sacrifice has wafted sweet
Prevailing incense to God's judgment-seat;
Our martyrs sitting by the angels' feet
Know their unbroken line is free.

God said, "Let Freedom be," as unto "Let Light,"
And burst a new creation on our sight,
Created in a year, and named aright
America the Free!

By this we pass from pain to realms of balm,
Striking our morning tumult through with calm,
Harmonious, holy, happy, with the psalm—
Our native land is free.

O'er life's warm heights within the luminous sky,
Through death's dim valleys where endless shadows lie,
Ring forth the psalm to all who live and die—
Our native land is free!

Almighty God! we swear by Thy high throne,
Though pain, blood, peril in our path be sown,
This glorious land we now may call our own
Shall be forever free!

THE CONFERENCE IN HAMPTON ROADS.

THE Conference of Titbit ended in a breach of faith upon the part of ALEXANDER of Russia with his allies and his acceptance of NAPOLEON'S terms. That is to say, NAPOLEON having conquered ALEXANDER in battle, informed him upon what terms he might have peace. This is the natural and historical end of every war. When two parties appeal to the sword, the one invariably and alone decides. It may be ingeniously masked, but it is there, and its edge is the true arbitrator.

This is as true in our war as it has ever been in any. But what is peculiarly true in ours, and true endeavored to show last week, because the point at issue is so vital and so simple. The indefatigable reporters at Washington and elsewhere, and the extraordinary editors, who print upon one page the most harrowing accounts of the atrocious barbarism of rebels toward loyal soldiers, and upon another speak of the rebel chiefs as "eminent Confederates," have produced a very unnecessary confusion in the public mind by talking of "terms," and "negotiations," and "treaties," and "concessions."

For our own part we have constantly attempted to show, and it is constantly necessary to repeat, that, despite the duration and scope and infinite sorrow of the war, the question is not only very simple, but its solution is perfectly plain. The authority of the Government of the United States is attacked. That authority will be maintained or lost. It can not be partly maintained and partly lost, for the same reason that a man is proud of a woman's virtue can not be; for the same reason that twice two can not sometimes make four and sometimes three; for the same reason that white can not be partly black, and gold partly bad. The just authority of the Government is supreme, or it is not. It is not supreme if it yields any just authority to force; and it does yield to force if the force does not utterly fail.

To suppose that the President or Secretary SEWARD could propose any thing but unconditional submission, first of all, was to suppose that they were hopeless of subduing the rebellion or that they were traitors. The latter supposition was insulting. The former was impossible, because the President had already said in his Message that peace was always to be had upon submission; and the Secretary had said at the meeting of the Christian Commission, only three days before he went to Fortress Monroe, that it only remained for a party vanquished in the field to offer its submission. The conference in Hampton Roads was thus, not only by the necessities of the case which they understood, but by their own personal and natural intelligence of the situation, reduced to one simple question and answer: "Do you submit?" If the answer was No, there would be war.

As to what the answer was likely to be no man competent to form an opinion could differ. The gentlemen who mysteriously hinted that peace was much nearer than was generally supposed, who did not wish to excite public expectation—but if the public expectation was great, it would probably not be disappointed—were to us simply to have forgotten the history of the last thirty years which some of them are engaged in nobly writing.

The rebel agents, or "eminent Confederates," were the representatives of the men who will fight to the last moment, and then retreat upon a provision they have made in Europe. Rebels like DAVIS and BENJAMIN do not wish, and do not mean, to become once more loyal citizens of the United States. They mean to hold every man they can against the bayonets of United States soldiers, and when they see they can hurl no more, then to save themselves. And this they will do just so long as they can control the military despotism which "eminent Confederates" call "the Confederate Government." To suppose that such men would send agents to offer their submission, is to betray a credulity and an ignorance of the working of human nature and of the lessons of universal history almost beyond belief.

The question of "dignity" in the course of the President does not, we confess, seem to us very distressing. The facts are at this writing not known beyond the single one of his repairing to Fortress Monroe. The reasons of his going there rather than remaining in Washington may be many; but there is one which may have weighed heavily with him, and that is, the absolute freedom from interference which was secured by going there, to which may be added the presence of Lieutenant-General GRANT if wanted. If the Commissioners were to be received and heard at all, and probably no one will deny that they were, then it was mainly a question of convenience in what spot they should be received. That the President may not stay to meet them shows how earnest and hearty is his wish to satisfy the most skeptical that he does all he can do to attain peace. If the rebel agents had really come to offer unconditional submission, should we have been profoundly troubled that the President went to Old Point? And even if, upon a knowledge of the facts, we should think that it would have been better to receive the agents at Washington, we should certainly consider it a very venial offense in the President to hold another view.

The result of the interview will, we hope, satisfy every man and editor that our business is to suppress, nor to listen to any talk except that every time an enthusiastic youth or a veteran politician believes himself called to be the representative of the Union, he is only speculating in double leads about any of the possible consequences. If the visit of Mr. BLAIR to Richmond produced the rebel embassy, the truth will be revealed unchanged. The rebels did not come to propose unconditional submission, we were no nearer peace than we were before. The rebels who figured as peace commissioners in the last summer are alleged to be the chief engineers of the diabolical plot to burn the cities of the North, and of the murderous raids along the frontier. They do not "represent Confederates," we suppose; but fine words butter no parsnips.

A body of unscrupulous chiefs are waging war upon the Government. They control a population which has been trained for more than a generation in the bitterest hostility to that Government and to their fellow-citizens at the North. This population is ignorant and brave. The contest, waged for four years, has shown the insanity of the chief conspirators to overthrow the Government. But only the most ignorant of the roughly beaten, or until the imminence of universal disaster produces a reaction which disposes of the chiefs, the rebellion will continue, and the dream of Peace is folly.

THE AMENDMENT.

IT can not be said that the Yankees do not learn. When the war began, General BUTLER offered his soldiers to repress movements of the slaves. Subsequently Judge MCCALLUM, who made themselves disagreeably notorious in repelling the best sources of information; and from one end of the country to the other it was agreed that it was a war for the Union only. So it was; so it has been; so it will be to the end. But that the Union and Slavery were henceforth inextricably, and that the attempt to trust choose the one or the other, was by no means a general popular conviction.

But the result of the first session of the war, the country having thought the matter over, has now seen what some men have always seen, that Slavery in a Union like ours has been, and always must be, a source of danger. The country, therefore, recommends the constitutional abolition of Slavery, and the country cries AMEN! The result has been very slowly reached, and we began that the only surprise now is the agreeable one that the present Congress has done the work.

As for the fifty-six members who voted against the proposition it is difficult to speak with sufficient condemnation or contempt. A system operated to every rebel heart and household, obtains, under the conviction that it is rapidly perishing, a foothold in the Union. Suddenly it renews its life; spreads into towering importance; debauches and demoralizes the whole machinery of legislation by open threats; and finally loses its absolute and universal ascendency in every department of the Government. Treason organizes a fierce conspiracy, and for four years tries to destroy the nation. At last the nation decrees to remove it, and fifty-six representatives resist upon the incredible ground that it is an inopportune time; that the public mind is excited; and that the rebels themselves do not seem in the best possible humor. Nothing according to this extraordinary theory, when a patient lies in mortal peril from a fever contracted in the fetid air of a swamp, it is better to wait until he is cured before the room is ventilated. The absurdity would be irresistible if the folly were not criminal.

A body of fifty-six Charles Firsts of England, or as many Charles Tenths of France, is the only parallel we can imagine for this ludicrous group of American citizens. Neither the French nor the English Charles would ever believe that the people were in earnest. Neither the Bourbon nor the Stuart could learn any thing from arguments or from blows. And this faction in the free States, which moribund Slavery leads by the hand, is at once the Jacobin and Jacobite element in our politics; Jacobin in its appeals to all that is most dastardly in human nature, and Jacobite in its unscrupulous clutch upon whatever denies the original rights of men.

For the last twenty years events have been trying the public men of this country until the very dregs at last appear. It is the most terrible record of the century. An honorable man hereafter would a thousandfold rather say that his name was voted against separation from Great Britain than that he voted against giving a lawful, peaceful chance of freedom to the slaves in America. The fortunes made in the anti-trade are largely held to be tainted; but what shall be said of the reputation made by solemnly voting against the legal removal of the inhuman atrocities of Slavery?

CROWS.

THERE are crows that fly "in heaven's sweetest air," and we have been always inclined to rank among them the lugubrious Greek who would count no man happy until he died. But certainly we have in this doleful company the croakers who continually sigh that nothing is done while any thing remains to do. If the sun is to rise at seven o'clock, they tell you at half past six that nothing has happened yet. If they were sailing to India, and had passed the Cape of Good Hope, they would still insist that, as they had not arrived, there was plainly no chance of arriving.

These are the gentlemen who are always sure that the rebellion can not be suppressed. It is in vain that SHERIDAN scatters EARLY in the Shenandoah; in vain that THOMAS routs HOOD in TENNESSEE; in vain that SHERMAN sweeps resistless through Georgia; in vain that FORT FISHER falls before PORTER and TERRY; in vain that GRANT holds Richmond in his unrelenting grasp. They hear—they admit; they smile a sickly smile, and with the usual cue it as other people do—but really they can not.

Of course we are speaking of the genuine croakers, not of those who affect to doubt the success of the Government that they may do their little all to prevent it. The smiling gentry who say, jauntily, "Oh, you can't put the rebels down!" and, deferentially, "The rebels won't surrender!" speak partly from party rancor, partly from malice, and partly from dullness. They are the dupes of the same sensation as the fiercest Richmond papers, but no more.

But those of whom we speak are truly patriotic, truly anxious for the national success. Indeed it may be only the ardor of their wishes, acting upon a morbid temperament, that makes them petulant of believing in victory. But we assure them that there is no ground of hope for the national cause. Affairs are not yet utterly desperate for the Union. There is still reason to believe that GRANT, SHERMAN, THOMAS, FARRAGUT, PORTER, SHERIDAN, MCCALLUM, and TERRY will not suddenly prove to be dolts, and their seamen and soldiers cowards. Be cheerful, gentlemen! It is a fine morning. If you are walking a mile you need not despair at the end of two thousand yards.

Remember in what condition the country was when Great Bethel and Bull Run were fought, not only of military but of mental preparation. Remember how long and long we were preparing to strike, and how enormously for ourselves the blow was at last delivered. Remember how we rallied from the Peninsula and BULL; how the great debate went on, enlightening the public mind as to the real significance of the war, until at length we stand where we do to-day, the policy of the war confirmed by the most prodigious popular demonstration, and the rebel cause constitutionally removed, and the ablest generals and admirals developed by the greatest victories.

Or look at the situation in detail. THOMAS is encamped upon the Tennessee, and there is no rebel force of any importance in the South-west to resist him. SHERMAN is moving in Carolina; SHERIDAN holds the Shenandoah; the only port of foreign intercourse and blockade-running is closed; and GRANT sits waiting before Richmond. Now this may be a very desperate war, but still it is war. The rebels may be very determined men, but still they are men. They have all the human conditions, and human nature its laws. After incessant and disastrous defeats, after the constant loss of men, material, and territory, war ends; and after being baffled, conquered, humiliated on every side, human nature succumbs. Cannon-balls may not persuade a party that it is wrong, but they will apparently persuade it that it can no longer advantageously fight. Why should not SHERMAN advance northward to join GRANT? and, once united with him, what will LEE do? Can he hope to give battle in the open field? Can he stay in Richmond? If he goes, can he expect to do more than prolong the death-struggle of the military rebellion?

These are a few of the considerations which we submit to our dismal friends. They need not feed upon apprehensions nor fatten upon doubts. If, in contemplating the public situation, they will use the same common sense as in viewing their private affairs, they will soon reach the conclusion that universal laws are as sure in the one as in the other.

SPAIN AT THE CONFESSIONAL.

THE most remarkable point in the proposition of NARVAEZ, the Spanish Prime Minister, to relinquish the war in San Domingo and to renounce all claim to the island is the reason he alleges for his action. Spain had supposed, he said, that the people of San Domingo wished to be reincorporated with the Spanish nation; and the right inherent in the unanimous wish of a people is, says the Prime Minister of Spain, a right not disputed. When protests appeared it was still the duty of the Government, he thinks, to ascertain whether they proceeded from the people or from a discontented few. The Government has, in his opinion, satisfied that duty. San Domingo is virtually in arms against annexation, and Spain yields to the indisputable popular wish, and retires.

This is precisely the colonial policy urged upon Great Britain by the wisest of her liberal party. When the mother country, they say, perceives that the colonies are self-supporting, and wish to stand alone, let her not repeat the tragical experiment of GEORGE III., but bless them and let them go. Then she becomes truly the mother of noble nations, whose institutions she has inspired, and whose sympathies will be always hers.

Spain, in the case of San Domingo, has doubtless made a merit of necessity. The truth is, she has found she can not scourge the colonies colony back, and so says, loftily, "Depart, my son, and take my blessing." The renunciation may be a little ostentatious in itself, but the principle which is relied upon to justify it is really nothing less than that of our own revolution, the right of the people to settle their own governments. The inherent rights of men NARVAEZ or any Spanish minister would like to follow it, for it justifies the Spanish Revolution of 1812 and of 1854. The proposition of NARVAEZ declares, in direct opposition to the doctrine of the Holy Alliance, that governments are founded upon public opinion, and not upon the divine right of kings.

This is another indication of the new political epoch of the world. The wars of the Holy Alliance in Europe, and the rebellion of Slavery in this country, are the last desperate struggles of the ancient system which founded government upon the concessions of a privileged class, and not upon the natural rights of men from which flows the doctrine of the consent of the governed. "We are essentially aristocratic," said JOHN C. CALHOUN. "We secured to ourselves of the rule of the majority," said JEFFERSON DAVIS. Both of these sentiments are in harmony with the late protest of the Pope against modern times, and the laws of human development. They are both worthy of TILMER or of JOSEPH LE MAISTRE.

In his funeral eulogy upon EDWARD EVERETT, the historian BANCROFT in his clear, nervous style, says that his friend would have failed in writing history, because he was not sufficiently accustomed to consider events as subordinate to law. Government is an experimental science, but some of its laws are as clear and comprehensible to those of astronomy. And those in this country who have been in the habit of seriously supposing that the Southern politicians were really statesmen, may see, on the one hand, in the total ruin of all CALHOUN'S theories, and, on the other, in the proposal of NARVAEZ, the difference between a disregard and perception of the fundamental principles of the science of government. If men who do not see events in subordination to law can not be historians, they can certainly not be statesmen.

OUR PRISONERS IN REBEL HANDS.

MR. RICHARDSON is a witness risen from the dead. His testimony concerning the treatment of our prisoners by the rebels is so graphic, so harrowing, and so solemn that it should be universally known. He says plainly that the rebels, or the "eminent Confederates," are deliberately killing our robust young men by hunger and cold; and when he escaped they were dying at the rate of thirteen per cent. per month—a mortality which, as he truly says, would in forty-eight hours send the population of any city flying from it as from a pestilence; for a fearful pestilence it would be. Now we have an excess of prisoners by at least fifteen or twenty thousand. "If we will not exchange," he asks, "why don't we retaliate? and if we will not retaliate, why don't we exchange?"

A very small part of the supplies sent to our prisoners from home ever reach them. They are stolen. We know also of instances in which Union officers from West Point have had the robes of cloaks, watches, and boots by their old classmates and companions now rebels. One box in six or ten may reach its destination. The rest will be seized by the thieves and hangers-on. Meanwhile the prisoners are dying at the rate of thirteen per cent. a month, or are tortured by hunger and suffering into enlisting in the rebel army.

Mr. RICHARDSON proposes two remedies, either of which, he thinks, will be adequate. The first is an immediate general exchange, by which we shall recover all our prisoners within a month. The second is an immediate special retaliation, not upon the rebel soldiers, but the rebel officers. In our custody, giving them, as nearly as possible, the same food, fuel, clothing, and shelter that our own men receive. This, he thinks, will bring the "eminent Confederates" to terms. The rebel leaders care nothing for their men in our hands; but the officers are of the chiefs of the conspiracy; they are of the blue blood of women-whippers and baby-sellers.

In proof of the virtue of this latter course Mr. RICHARDSON refers to the case of the Union Captains SAWYER and FLYNN, who were sentenced by the rebels to be hung. The Government ordered the Commandant at Fortress Monroe to execute LEE and WINDER the moment he should ascertain the threat against our men had been carried out. It never was. Again, when the rebels put our colored prisoners to work in the fortifications of Richmond under fire, General BUTLER informed the rebel authorities that he had placed an equal number of rebel officers on his works under fire. Before the sun set the colored soldiers were put back in Libby, and were never exposed again in the fortifications.

The statement and argument of Mr. RICHARDSON are very forcible, and no question deserves prompter consideration and more decisive action. Yet in suggesting a general exchange does he not forget that the rebels refuse to exchange our colored prisoners?—a point which at least embarrasses an easy settlement. General BUTLER proposed to exchange first the white prisoners man for man, and then he says we should still have held so many more of the rebels than they of our colored prisoners that we could have dictated terms. For some reason this plan was not adopted. Perhaps for this, among others, that it seemed rather absurd to allow an enemy who held fewer of our men than we of theirs to dictate disadvantageous exchanges of soldiers; and it was rather a cruel desertion of those who had risked more in enlisting than their brethren in arms, to leave them in the hands of the tormentors, even if they were offset by a larger number of rebel captives. Besides, if we had retained some of the rebel officers as hostages, it might have been impossible to settle the cartel; while, if we had not, the larger number of rebel privates could not have certainly saved the colored Union soldiers.

As to the second suggestion, of retaliation in kind upon the officers, there are two obvious difficulties: The first is, to ascertain exactly what the rebel treatment is; the next is, the impracticability of retaliation in kind when it is ascertained. That rebel officers should be shot to death upon clear proof of the atrocities alleged seems to be a proper retaliation. But that they should be starved to death, or frozen to death, or stung to death by mosquitoes, could no more be inflicted by a decent conqueror than that they should be eaten alive if our soldiers had been so treated by other savages with whom we were at war.

That some change should be done, and done at once, we are most cordially agreed. That the Government is of the same opinion, but finds the difficulties very perplexing, we are as fully convinced. And the testimony of men of Messrs. RICHARDSON and BROWNE will be a most valuable aid to a wiser and speedier decision we do not doubt.

HOW TO CHEER THE SOLDIERS.

WHOEVER wishes to help the invalid soldiers can do so at a very small expense of personal effort. The great engines like the Sanitary Commission are very apt to paralyze individual exertion by the obvious reflection that while every body is doing something no single body need do any thing. But the very good plan of remedying this negligence is the monthly tax of a larger or smaller amount, self-imposed, by many of the most active circles of co-workers of the Sanitary in every city and town. But another very striking of books that have been read in the family, with the old magazines and illustrated papers.

The value of these to the soldiers in the listless hours of hospital life is incalculable. Nor need any one refrain from sending because he may have so few to send. If one person in every village sent a dozen books—if fifty persons go from a single neighborhood, the aggregate is one that can be readily computed.

A letter just received from the Ninth Corps Hospital at City Point says, speaking of the prompt receipt of a box of books and a package of pamphlets and Harper's Weeklies, etc.: "I need not say that they are a great addition to our humble library, and eagerly welcomed by the soldiers here. It is singular but true that of all my appeals to acquaintances and friends for books none have been successful thus far except in your case. It is because they are ignorant that the gospel of good books are a ministry to the spirits in a prison hospital."

Why will not every reader of these lines send a little addition to the means of amusement for the soldiers, either to the nearest depôt of the Sanitary Commission, to some hospital known to him, or to Mr. J. SAYLES AGNEW United States Sanitary Commission, Ninth Corps Hospital, City Point—prepaying all the charges?

DROWNED.

We are wrecked and we are sinking,
We are lost, I heard them say,
But of what could be left me living?
'Tis not "lost" to pass away—

Gently, painlessly, together,
Thus to feel our souls flow out
Into calmer, better weather,
All secure from further rout.

I can see the boats yet, gaining
Very little on the wind,
Our their sterns some forms are straining
After dear ones left behind.

If 'twere thus with thee and me, love,
One had gone and one been left,
Then the living could but die, love,
And the dying be bereft.

But thou couldst not, couldst not leave me,
Since there was but room for one,
And the billows would upheave me
Did I leave thee here alone.

I am happy, for thy fingers
Round my neck securely twine,
Thou art happy while death lingers
With thy heart at rest on mine.

I, the stronger, grew despairing
When thou didst grow pressed nigh,
For I could not bear my darling
Such a dreadful death should die.

We can feel the waters singing,
Cold and heavy, in our ears;
And upon them springing,
We can see our by-gone years.

Cling closer to me, sweetest,
I will not let thee go,
Thou shalt not die for me, O,
Though death come swift or slow.

Even I can scarcely hold thee,
But will, unto the last;
Mine arms shall not unfold thee
Till death be overpast.

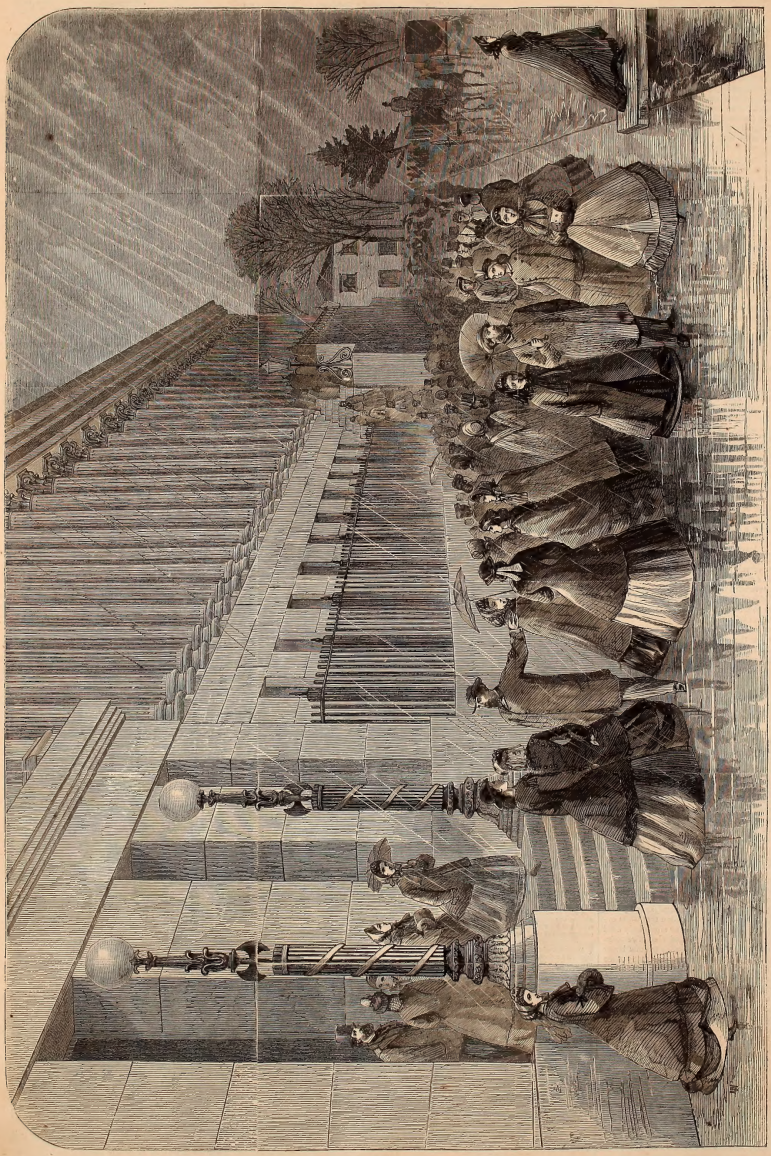
Thy face grows strangely radiant,
Our last warm breath is o'er,
Good-by, sweet, for an instant,
Then part we nevermore.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

SHREWD SUGGESTION.—It often happens, when the husband fails to be home to dinner, that it is one of his fast days.

WOMAN'S AGE.—It is a curious fact that in sacred history age, sex, and beauty go hand in hand one woman—Sarah, the wife of Abraham—is distinctly noted. Women's ages ever since appears not to have been a subject for history or discussion.

A GENTLE HINT.—The Pope has presented a hat of crimson velvet, lined with ermine, to the Emperor of China. What is a very appropriate present for a Pope who has always considered highly symbolical. It was first used when the Pope had treated the Emperor in a very civil manner, and in one of the many forms of collecting Peter's pence, called "living round with the hat."



ADVICE TO CAPTAINS IN THE ARMY.—In forming your companies on the banks of a deep and rapid river be careful how you select your men to "ford the stream."

LIQUID AND GHOST FAT.—Democritus, who was always laughing, lived one hundred and nine years; Heraclitus, who was always weeping, only lived forty. Laughing, then, is best; and to laugh at one another is perfectly justifiable. Once we said that Democritus was very fat, and originated in one of the many forms of collecting Peter's pence, called "living round with the hat."

LADY CLERKS LEAVING THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT AT WASHINGTON.—[SKETCHED BY A. R. WARD.]

SPOT OF M'PHERSON'S DEATH.

THE adjoining cut, from an excellent photograph by GEORGE N. BARNARD, shows the scene and surroundings of General M'PHERSON'S death. A simple inscription upon a tree tells the story so far as he was concerned, while the details of the picture—the shot and shell, the broken artillery-wagon, with the skeletons of the horses lying where they fell, the soldier's dilapidated hat and shoe—indicate the scene of carnage just as it was left after the battle had swayed from this to some other portion of the field.

On the morning of July 22 General M'PHERSON, commanding the Army of the Tennessee, then at Decatur, anticipating an attack upon his left, ordered the Sixteenth Corps to form on the left of the Seventeenth. While this movement was going on the rebel assault was made, advantage being taken of the gap which still remained between the two corps. The flank of the Seventeenth was turned and a battery lost, when M'PHERSON, approaching the scene of the fight, was shot by the force of the enemy which had advanced between the right and left wing. A charge was then made to recapture the artillery and recover the General's body. The guns were taken, the enemy repulsed, and STRONG and BUELL, of M'PHERSON'S staff, returned with an ambulance bearing the body.

These officers had been guided to the spot by Private GEORGE J. REYNOLDS. The latter, a member of the Fifteenth Iowa, had been on skirmish duty, and was wounded. In attempting to evade capture he came upon the spot where M'PHERSON was lying, mortally wounded. Forgetting his own wound REYNOLDS clung to his old commander, and, exposed to the shots of the enemy, administered to his wants, bringing water to quench his thirst, affording him every possible comfort in his last moments; and finally, his own wound still uncared for, sought out the General's staff and guided them to the fatal spot. M'PHERSON'S name had been the battle-cry of the corps in the struggle which ended in forcing the rebels from the field:

"Ah! gleets ze brasse,
When through the battle-flame
We saw our hero fall;
We forced the foe to yield
His body on the field,
That our breasts might be its pall."

There was no more gallant soldier in the army than General JAMES B. M'PHERSON, and none more beloved by his command.

THE PEACE COMMISSION.

THREE Commissioners, appointed by the rebel authorities to treat informally upon terms of peace, have been within our lines, and have had an interview with the President and Secretary of State near Fortress Monroe. The facts, so far as known in connection with this mission, are these: Having been detained for some time at City Point, the rebel Commission, consisting of ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS, R. M. T. HUNTER, and JOHN A. CAMPBELL, was admitted by General GRANT, and conveyed to Fortress Monroe on that General's flag-ship, where it arrived at 5 P.M. February 2. Here Secretary SEWARD was found in waiting on board the River Queen. The Secretary invited the Commissioners to dinner upon his flag-boat, which invitation was accepted. About ten o'clock in the evening the President arrived, and a conference began which lasted sixteen hours. On the 4th the President and Secretary returned to Washington, and it was given out that the result of the negotiation was a failure.

So far as its immediate result is concerned the Commission has probably failed. But it will at least produce a better understanding between our Government and the rebels. The President's course was clearly defined by the necessities of the case. His official oath forbade him to permit secession. In order to any negotiation at all, it must proceed upon the basis of a restored Union. In all other respects President LINCOLN was limited to the exercise of the functions proper to him as Commander-in-Chief. He could repeal his confiscation measures, and could grant a general pardon. If other conditions were necessary to satisfy the rebel Commissioners, Mr. LINCOLN could only have replied that it was not in his power to grant them. If they wanted guarantees for slavery, Mr. LINCOLN had no more power to grant them than he would have to abolish slavery. If they wanted an alliance offensive and defensive, still maintaining a separate Confederation, he had no power to grant it.

The Commissioners have returned to Richmond, carrying with them the views of our Government. They are all men to whom the people of the South render respect. There will never occur a better opportunity than now occurs for them to exert their influence in favor of peace on the basis of Union. The country still remembers the force and foresight displayed by STEPHENS in his argument against the secession of Georgia. Mr. HUNTER, too, although a States-Rights man, had endeavored in Virginia to prevent a collision between the Government and the State. He was subsequently appointed Secretary of State under the Confederate Government, and upon his resignation of that office was elected Senator, and made President pro tem. of the Senate. Judge CAMPBELL, of Alabama, also, was very reluctant to leave the Union. He was at Washington when the Commissioners sent by DAVIS in March, 1861, were there seeking an official interview with the President in regard to the evacuation of Fort Sumter; and when those Commissioners demanded recognition, he wrote to DAVIS "to restrain his Commissioners."

It may be, however, that no peace will come until we shall have absolutely conquered it. While the Commissioners were steaming down the James, SHERMAN'S columns were marching northward from the Savannah. If he is successful in the campaign now opening, peace can not long be delayed.

It can certainly no longer be charged against the Administration that it has neglected an opportunity to obtain peace on the basis of Union. The members of the Opposition have no longer an argument against vigorous war measures. These rebels say that they mean exactly what they meant four years ago: we must answer that we also are unchanged.

ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS, OF GEORGIA.

R. M. T. HUNTER, OF VIRGINIA.

THREE months at sea, and one on shore;
Three months at sea—yet not afloat;
Around our home the breakers roar,
Yet own we neither ship nor boat.
Rock-based, amid the swirl of foam,
The light-house stands—it is our home.

Three months at sea—a dreary time—
The ship goes gayly on its way;
Now and again a mellow chime
Comes to us through the dash of spray.
The ship will reach the nether zone
While we still pace the light-house lone.

While we still pace, and hear the sound
That comes from yon far village spire,
Where still the children gather round
The cheery board, the crackling fire.
Or seaward gaze, at dead of night,
To watch our slow, revolving light.

The skipper, through the midnight haze,
Marks well its gleam, and feels its worth.
"God's blessing on the light!" he says,
But gives it still a wider berth.
And so it shines, from sun to sun,
A thing to bless, and yet to shun.

And when the tempests howl and rave,
And driving clouds shut out the day,
And o'er the lantern top the wave
Flies skyward into feathered spray,
We laugh, my comrades twain and I,
To feel ourselves so warm and dry.

The light-house quivers to its base,
Yet, sung within, we know no fears;
We know its stones could fearless face
Still stouter gales in bygone years.
Thank God, our lot is not amiss,
There's many a life far worse than this!

WINIFRED'S EYES.

THE girls all said it was only Winifred's eyes. They were sure she was far enough from handsome, but she had good eyes, and what was more, she knew how to use them. You and I, not having any rivalry in the matter, might have come to a very different conclusion about her beauty; but it would have been too much to expect any thing like fair judgment from the Meadowbrook girls, every one of whom knew how easy it would be for her in half an hour to spirit away the most devoted of their admirers. It was a blessing, they all averred, to be owned, if Winifred ever should get married; then other people could tell where they stood.

Form given, they would-be-wed, yet girlish and agile; small feet; dainty hands that broom-handles and dish-water had in vain conspired to spoil; a graceful little head, with a full crown of chestnut hair; a spirited face, with bright lips, dancing hazel eyes, a brilliant, changeful color, and the most piquant of noses, just sufficiently retrousse for archness—that was Winifred Payne. It must have been on the nose that the girls hung their assertions that Winifred was not handsome; but I think her face would have lost some of its sparkling charm if she had exchanged it for any Grecian or Roman one of them all. The men, young and old, single and married, all thought she was perfect. Not that she was a flirt. She was coquettish, perhaps, with the natural coquetry of all pretty girls; but she received all serious entanglements, and if she charmed every one it was not because she studied to do it—rather, perhaps, because she did not.

In all Meadowbrook there was only one to whom she had ever given enough encouragement to constitute the shadow of a claim; and even with this nobody-favored Harry Morris it was more his own natural coaxing and persistence that kept up hers; of grace in him than any smiles of Winifred's. He had loved her before she wore long dresses, and he had loved her ever since. He meant to have her. Of course he did not know when; that must be as Winifred pleased; but of the ultimate result of his wooing he never doubted. When any one she showed her attention it aroused him. He asked her occasionally when she would be ready to marry him, and always received some provoking, saucy answer, which was far enough from discouraging him. He said he thought it was time to give at something a little more definite, and with this purpose he set out one June evening to traverse the mile-long street between his house and the White Payne's. The early June moon was just rising, and he planned how he would win Winifred out to walk with him in the moonlight; what strong, earnest words he would say to her—words which should stir to its depths the gay girlish heart which, he never doubted, was under its mask of merry coquetry a love as deep and lasting as his own.

The Widow Payne's was the very best-ideal of a cottage—a soft mouse-gray in color, of Gothic architecture, with vines, just now heavy with leaves and odorous with blossoms, rioting in and out of every open window, covering the pretty portico, twisting about every where.

As Harry drew near he saw a light in the little parlor and heard through the open windows a stranger's voice. No sound could have been more unwelcome; but it was not in his nature to turn back. He knocked at the door, and the widow bade him come in. Winifred, radiant in smiles, and charming in blue muslin, was evidently making herself agreeable to the stranger whose voice Harry had heard as he came up. The stranger was not of the Meadowbrook order. City-bred was stamped on his haughty face, betrayed itself in the careless, graceful ease of his manner. Not even jealousy could fail to acknowledge that at last here was one whose rivalry was more to be dreaded than twenty rose, of rustic lads. He noticed even the well-shod foot, the hand, white as a girl's, with a sealring on the little finger, the faultless attire; above all, the handsome, bearded face, with the dark eyes full of magnetic power.

Yet he noticed all this in the moment in which Winnie Payne to see who he was, and, finishing her sentence to her companion, to rise to meet him. Her "Good-evening, Harry," sounded to him less cordial than usual, but she introduced him politely:

"Mr. Manchester, this is Mr. Morris, one of my Meadowbrook friends."

There was a fine sting in the sentence under which her visitor winced. Why did she say a Meadowbrook friend? Was the statement an excuse for his country breeding, or an apology for her own intimacy with him?

He stepped forward, however, to Mr. Manchester, and extended his hand for a cordial greeting, after the fashion of Meadowbrook. Mr. Manchester touched the brown, labor-hardened hand disdainfully, and then sat down and looked at Winifred complacently, as if he had done something very self-denying and meritorious. Harry saw, of course, the young farmer felt himself in the uncomfortable position of one too many. Mrs. Payne did her kindly best to make the talk general. She inquired about his mother's health, and his father's spring planting. Then conversation languished, and Morris had time to watch Winnie, who was showing to Mr. Manchester a bouquet of varnished leaves, bright with the splendors of last year's autumn.

"Yes, they are pretty," he heard the gentleman say, looking, at the same time, not at the leaves but into Winifred's hazel eyes.

Harry Morris wondered if she were not even more charming than usual. Her blue dress and blue ribbons became her. Her cheeks were bright with just the delicate hue that stains a peach blossom, and her smiles came and went with her words. Of course, he thought, the lady would leave her—folks didn't come across such girls every day, city or country—and she might—but that way lay madness. He got up to go, with a sudden conscious of having been cold and neglectful, went to the door with him. When he got there he seemed in no hurry.

"How bright the moon is!" he said. "Come out with me a little way, do, Winnie."

His tone was almost pleading. It cost Winnie an honest pang to refuse his request.

"I can't," she said. "Mr. Manchester would think it so strange."

"And who is Mr. Manchester, Winnie? He seems to be mourner of all he surveys."

He is a cousin of Mrs. Lansing by here a day or two ago, looking for a place to board a little while, and the cottage pleased him. So he stopped until permanent boarders could be had. He hadn't been well, he said, and needed country air."

Humph!" Harry did not realize how nearly his tone was "Did he happen to see you as he rode along?"

"I suppose he must;" and a little arch gleam shot from the hazel eyes; "at least he might. I was out trimming the vines."

"Yes, I suppose so," said Winnie, it is hardly like your mother's good sense to take into her house in this way a stranger of whom she knows nothing."

"But we do know. He is a cousin of Mr. Lansing, the minister you know, who came here and still staid two years."

"Well, it may be all right. I hope it is; but I like old friends better than new ones. So you have to walk in the moon, Winnie."

"I can't, indeed. I have staid out here too long. Good-night."

There was no excuse but for him to say goodnight too, and go sorrowfully on his homeward way. But for him the splendor of the night was gone.

Winifred rose to her visitor's departure a little afraid Mr. Manchester would ask her something about her friend, or make some comment on the length of time he had been a good-by. Her fears were groundless. Charles Manchester had altogether too much tact to elevate the country clown, as he mentally called him, to any more importance by making him a topic of conversation. He did not mention him, but went on with the subject he had been talking about before he came, as if there had been no interruption.

That night in her own room Winifred questioned her heart a little. Secretly, it must be confessed, she had believed herself in love with Harry Morris. She had got used to him, liked him, in a sisterly way, but she had thought she loved him, and in her secret soul had expected some day to be his wife. But did she love him as she had thought she did? Was it not all been a delusion? Was it not merely that she had never been out of Meadowbrook, and having seen nothing of the world was without any standard of comparison?

How different he was from Mr. Manchester! She contrasted his stately, handsome, dark face with the elegant grace of the city gentleman—his brown hands, which no dog and scythe and plow-handle had hardened, with the fair, white hands of Harry—the brilliant ring looked suitable as on a woman's—the ringing, full-toned voice, with the mellifluous accents which had charmed her, Mr. Manchester's manytactied in—the subjects of his discourse, farm-plans, neighbors' crops, and gossip with Mr. Manchester's graceful talk about poets and painters—his dress, the black suit he wore so awkwardly on state occasions, with the elegant, careless negligee in which seemed a part of the other's identity. When she had summed it all up, she made up her mind that she had been self-deluded in fancying that she loved Harry. Having seen Mr. Manchester the night had just its sweet, and when next she met him she was ashamed of herself.

The next evening Harry, in a fit of self-discontent, such as she had never before known. She had reigned in Meadowbrook like a little queen of hearts, and it had never occurred to her to wish she was any different. Now she began to despise herself because she could not talk French, or play on the piano. Was Harry ignorant? She participated in fancy the style of women to whom Charles Manchester was accustomed, and scorned herself for the contrast she was presented to him. Then she remembered the old romances where men of high degree fell in love with bright eyes shining far below them; and bethought herself of the admiring looks which had all the evening paid her such constant attention, and went to sleep thanking fate for hazel eyes, and chestnut hair, and pink cheeks.

In her dreams she saw constantly those two—Mr. Manchester, handsome, haughty, elegant—Harry Morris, stalwart, earnest, honest, one of the world's workers. One she walked on the edge of a precipice, and Mr. Manchester seemed about to push her of, when Harry Morris snatched her back, and, in saving her, lost his own footing and fell down.

Again, Harry was going to bind her with iron chains, and Mr. Manchester threw down away, and twined round her wrists instead wreaths of roses. But the thorns among the roses pricked her; and when she looked at the chains she saw they were but only laughed, and told her that all fetters hurt; but it was better to wear roses than iron, because the world only saw the bonds, and smelled the fragrance, and would never know if she kept still, how the thorns pricked her. It was ill-bred to cry out, and to let Harry see what pain he was to her wicked.

In the energy with which she did battle against this heresy she awoke, and the early June sun was already shining into her room. She sprang up, and dressed herself with rapid finger. With her delicate pink calico morning-dress, her chestnut hair brushed till it shone like satin, her bright cheeks and sparkling eyes, she looked lovely enough to charm any man's senses. She didn't let me sleep, so here I am, an early riser in spite of myself. But how delicious morning is in the country! I think, while I am here, I shall like to be willing to miss the balm of this before-breakfast air."

Then he gathered the pinkest of pink roses, and gallantly fastened it in her drooping hair, laying it first an instant against her cheek, as if to see which was brightest. Winifred was quite unused to such compliments. Her cheeks, and the sky full of her eyelids, were very pretty to see.

Winifred made no change in her habits because of Mr. Manchester's presence in the household. She went on just as ever with all her homely, domestic duties. He saw her sometimes with bare arms and floury hands at the kneading-trough, with a sunbonn pound her head, and needed country air."

Humph!" Harry did not realize how nearly his tone was "Did he happen to see you as he rode along?"

"I suppose he must;" and a little arch gleam shot from the hazel eyes; "at least he might. I was out trimming the vines."

"Yes, I suppose so," said Winnie, it is hardly like your mother's good sense to take into her house in this way a stranger of whom she knows nothing."

"But we do know. He is a cousin of Mr. Lansing, the minister you know, who came here and still staid two years."

The next evening Harry, in a fit of self-discontent, such as she had never before known. She had reigned in Meadowbrook like a little queen of hearts, and it had never occurred to her to wish she was any different. Now she began to despise herself because she could not talk French, or play on the piano. Was Harry ignorant? She participated in fancy the style of women to whom Charles Manchester was accustomed, and scorned herself for the contrast she was presented to him. Then she remembered the old romances where men of high de-course led? And yet he was good and generous, fond and faithful. Would any eyes ever look at her with such perfect satisfaction and approval as his always had? She suited him; he would never be tempted to wish her different. She stole back to him. If he had been a little more elegant! If his hands were not quite so hard and brown, if he had but a more stylish air, a grace like Mr. Manchester's, it would have been easier to make a hero of him. She decided at length, and, kindly as she could, she gave him his answer.

"No, Harry, I do not think I love you enough to look forward to a married life with you. I do care for you very much, but not the way you want me to. Forgive me."

"You are sure?" he asked, sadly.

"Yes, I think I am sure. I should not make you happy."

"Well, God bless you. May some one make you happy, Winnie, as happy as I wanted to!"

She dared not trust herself to say any more. The words seemed to choke him. He stooped her hand so hard that the little fingers were red half an hour later with the pressure, and then he hurried away.

Sitting by herself, after he went away, Winifred pitied him, and questioned her own heart. Had she done well? Had she not put aside pure gold to crown her brow with tinsel? Would any fine gentleman ever love her as that strong, honest heart had loved? Yet she did not ask him. She answered herself there. How many things she liked for which he cared nothing! How stupid it would be to be mistress of his farm—to superintend baking and butter-making, washing and mending! What a contrast between that life and the one Mr. Manchester's wife would lead—the travel, the sight-seeing, and dressing and society! He had told her, last night, that she had every qualification necessary to shine in any drawing-room, save a little knowledge of conventionalities, which would come to her in due season. And then a still, small voice in her soul vexed her with its persistent questions —would this life be any nobler, any worthier, any more satisfying? Would it lead her any nearer to the goal for which every true soul must strive? Was there any moral excellence in dancing, and dressing, and flirting? Would it not be better for it might be good in spite of it—but how if one put one's self voluntarily in the way of temptation? She answered herself, pitilessly, but loyal:

"Of course I shouldn't have been made to love such things if it wasn't right for me to enjoy them. Let those who have a taste for such things and gridirons live in kitchens, and wear homespun—for me, I like the graces and adornments of life better."

Then, to settle the matter, she went and made herself busy gathering strawberries and hulling them for Mr. Manchester's supper.

Toward dusk he came home, gallant and fascinating as ever; but for the first time his manner gave Winifred an impression of unreality. She did not like to analyze it, but the little, satirical curve of Harry Morris's truth and earnestness served as a touchstone. When they talked, after supper, there was a slight strain of sarcasm in some of the remarks upon country living and country people that jarred unpleasantly upon her mood. She began to question herself whether she was really capable of an exception to all her neighbors as his courtesy insinuated. If he should marry her, would there not come a time when he would tire of his country bride, and wish he had never seen her?

Perhaps he divined from her absence of mind that he was losing ground. He did his best to regain it. He exerted the charm of a manner which had been pronounced irresistible in drawing-rooms, and the little country maiden could not help yielding something to its spell. They walked together in the moonlight, under the trees full of fragrance, and she let him hold her hand that had tingled so that afternoon with Harry Morris's strong pressure. Before he reached the cottage gate he sounded doubly sweet in the night stillness, the great, wide night throbbing with a passionate fullness of magic and mystery that daytime never knows.

Still not a week had passed before she knew that she loved him. Charles Manchester left, and never should love him. Now that she had lost Harry Morris the spell of the old time began to reassert its power. She could not shared so many hours with him, their lives were linked by so many old memories, that she could have been impossible to forget. But, after all, the strongest connection he had for her was the strength of his love and his nature. She had never realized it until Charles Manchester gave birth. He poetry and sentiment ceased to charm. His dark, persuasive eyes beguiled her in vain. His silver tongue had lost its power. And yet she made up her mind deliberately that he should be hers. She seemed to her that only when she had refused Mr. Manchester would she have the right to go to Harry Morris and tell him that she had misunderstood her own heart, and had come to him as the next best opening. She was too proud to endure that imputation. Unless she could say to him, "I could have been Charles Manchester's wife, and I would not, because I loved you," she would not go to him at all. And so for the time she determined to be with Meadowbrook love assumed all the intensity of a passion, and she gave to it the whole energy of her nature. She had staked her life upon it, and must. Through this move she was to win or lose all.

So all through July they played at this game of hearts—Charles Manchester with his city airs, his world-wisdom, his experience; Winifred with her woman's wit and woman's will. She brought into service all her attractions—was coy and shy sometimes, tender sometimes, playful sometimes. If he had had a heart she must have won it. The trouble was he had none. It was quite impossible for him to love heartily, honestly, self-forgetfully; and, of course, only such a love would have won him willing to ignore all inequalities of position, and marry the landlady's daughter. Still he was determined to make her love him, and show some signs of it—scarcely less determined in his purpose than Winifred was in hers. He found her very tantalizing. One hour he would be almost sure she adored him, and would break her heart when he went away—the next, her caresses and her words would seem so utterly spontaneous, and untouched by any sentimental miscries, that he would be just as sure she did not care for him. It vexed him, piqued him into new attempts. He had succeeded so often that to fail now was not to be borne. Sometimes he was half tempted to propose to her, just to satisfy his curiosity at last as to whether she did love him. But the risk of being accepted was too great.

The first of August a summons came that must take him away. It found him just as uncertain as ever of the state of Winifred's heart, as he went to her with this letter in his hand.

"I must go to-morrow," he said, in a tone of lingering regret. "A party of friends, whom I promised to join in a tour to the Lakes, set off next week, and I must get at once to New York. I remember if I shall ever see Meadowbrook again—never Winifred again!"

All the time he was speaking he watched her keenly, and she knew it. She would not let him triumph by so much as a blush or the quiver of an eyelash. She answered him quite calmly.

"Oh yes, you'll be getting ill again, perhaps, and want a whiff of country air."

"But it would not be well for me to come to Meadowbrook for it. I shall not be the happier in years to come for what I have already seen of you, Winnie. I wish Miss Livingston were more like you!"

"Miss Livingston?" with just the slightest accent of inquiry.

"Yes, my cousin whom I am to marry—an old engagement."

The next moment Winifred was half across the garden, most energetically driving out an old hen, who was conducting her chickens in too near neighborhood to the pink-bed. When she returned she began talking upon some subject which had nothing to do with his departure, or with Miss Livingston. He had made his last move, and had to confess himself checkmated.

The next morning he went away. He bade Mrs. Payne a respectful good-by; then holding Winnie's hand, and drawing her to the door with him, he whispered, lightly,

"Good-by, little one. I shall not forget to drink your health now and then. Good luck, a happy life, and adieu, love!"

With that he just lifted her hand to his lips and was gone. She felt, with a passionate impatience in digestion, as if she should hate her hand forever because he had touched it. This, then, was the man for whom she had been ready to give up Harry Morris's honest love! Suppose she had done it, and perhaps she would if she had never known Harry, what would her love have been worth to him more than the clear stamp of the silver piece he threw away? Thank God, she had been spared that humiliation. Still, through him, had she not lost all? But for him she knew she should never have said no to Harry; and now that was all over. She had failed in winning Mr. Manchester, and Harry would think it was only that failure which had sent her to his arms. Under such circumstances would even his heart be large enough to take her in? At any rate she would never try him. So she came back quietly to life-long despair, with the curious resignation of young girls who decide that they are never to be happy again, as readily as if happiness or misery were altogether in their power.

The autumn passed, with its wild Presidential excitement, for it was the autumn of 1860, and the last white winter went by, and the great rebellion began, and in May they were getting up a Company of Meadowbrook boys to enlist for three years of the war. All this time Harry Morris had never been near the little grey cottage, nor had Winifred seen any thing of him, except a distant figure now and then at church or lyceum. He was among the first to enlist, and she heard it with a curious mingled mult of pride in him, apprehension for his safety, and a wild longing to ask him to forgive her before he went away. She resisted it until the very last night. Then, when the May moon was high, she went out of doors, scarcely knowing what she meant to do. She flitted on barefooted among the flowers, keeping in the shadow where she could, on toward his house. She did not exactly intend to go in—she had settled purpose, only her heart beat so fast on in spite of herself. A few rods from his door she saw him standing in the moonlight. She was tempted, when she saw him, to turn and run back; but he had already seen her, and came forward to meet her.

"Is that you, Winnie?" he said, with a sad gentleness of tone that struck to her heart. "You should not be out in this heavy dew with nothing on your head."

"I know—I did not think," she said, pantingly; then, with an eagerness she could not help, she asked, "Are you going to-morrow, Harry?"

"Yes, I am going."

Would he say no more? How could she break in upon his silence with her prayer for forgiveness? But could she let him go, and die, perhaps, without ever knowing how sorry she was? At last she asked, timidly,

"Should you have gone all the same if I had said Yes to you last June?"

"I hope I should," he answered, gravely. "I do not think that would have changed my duty, though it might have made it harder to do it. As it is, there is no one who will miss me very much."

The sad resignation of his tone conquered the last lingering throb of pride. Almost before she knew it her hands were clasped upon his arm, and she was crying, in a voice broken with sobs,

"Oh, Harry, Harry! I did love you! I did not know until afterward how well! I have been too proud and foolish to tell you, and now I feel that it was because I could not get Mr. Manchester. But I could not have you go away and not know how sorry I was, though I don't suppose you can ever love me again!"

"Not again, Winnie, for I never ceased to love you yet, and I never should. My darling, my darling!"

That was all; for what else they said was whispered so low that not even the night-birds could catch the words, and surely they do not belong to my story.

Perhaps, though, you will be glad to know that Harry Morris served his three years, and came out at last with two stripes on his shoulder, honor and hope and life. Not all soldiers die on battle-fields or rill up hospitals. This summer he came home, and, his time having run out, resolved to stay. Heaven grant that, like the people in the nursery tales, they may be happy ever after!

A WIFE'S SECRET.

I WAS forty years old when I married Caroline Mowbray. A severe disappointment which I experienced in early life had changed me much. To that personal I cannot allude, for it is now repulsive; but I thought she knew me better. Her father was a clergyman of small means, and she had four brothers, two of them already in the service. I met her. Our courtship was short. Her father was happy to see his last child provided for, and our wedding was celebrated with great pomp. Two or three brothers were there; the other two were in India, took her to our secluded house in the country, and for a year and more I lived a life of happiness such as falls to the lot of few.

She was of wonderful beauty. Tall, of exquisite rounded shape, with a face of perfect brilliant blackness. She was much given to melancholy, which greatly increased after the first year of our union. I then began to fancy that the memory of some old affection haunted her; but she often told me that I was the only man she had ever loved, and that my well-known jealousy of accomplished men (those were her words) had long caused her to entertain for me the greatest respect, even before she had seen me.

Several times I came upon her unexpectedly, and found her in tears, with an open letter in her hand. On my entreating her to let me share the cause of her unhappiness she pleaded nervousness, the thought of her father's delicate health, or other family matters, which, she assured me, I could not entirely. I troubled myself much about this. I thought that my manner toward her was not sufficiently tender enough, and indeed no manner could show the boundless depth of my love for her; then I thought that this disparity of our years precluded a perfect interchange of feeling and sentiment.

We had been married fifteen months when most unexpected news came to me from India. My English relative had died there, leaving me a large fortune, and my presence was required in Bengal to arrange important affairs. I hesitated whether to go alone about to sail I resolved to take passage in her, and I settled all things needful for my wife's comfort during my absence, which was likely to be a twelvemonth. Her despondency deepened, and I strove to flatter myself that my approaching departure was the cause.

I had had a lovely garden laid out for her. A side-walk led down to a tasteful bridge of ornamental wood, which spanned a small stream of insignificant stream in dry weather, but a dangerous torrent during the rains. In time of flood the water rushed down with great velocity, and was spoken of as "foreting" of the bridge, several of the flooring-boards were usually carried off. This bridge led into a park, just beyond which were the stables, and the stables commanded a view of our garden. Although there was then a dearth of good servants in the house, none of the servants were allowed to avail themselves of it; our usual evening stroll was the garden and the park, and those were strictly private.

For some days the rain had been falling heavily, and our walks were impossible. The servants escaped, however, by business in the neighboring town, and did not return as early as usual for several days in succession.

I returned one dark rainy evening just before sunset. Much rain had fallen, and as I crossed the bridge on foot I noticed that the water looked turbid and whirling beneath. This was not my usual way of going home, but in consequence of the rain I rode straight to the stables, left my horse with the groom, and took the short cut. There was a shaky summer-house at the further corner of the garden, and I observed, to my surprise, a man lounging along the path leading thither from the bridge. The pitch-wood torch was not lighted, and it was dusk; and my surprise was increased by coming to a spot in which they seemed to have been met by another person's prints, and thence to the summer-house. Whose foot but hers could have made those tiny impressions? I reached the summer-house, and there I found my wife.

"Good Heavens, Caroline!" I exclaimed; "you out on such all evening—you so delicate?" She was shivering with cold. "Who was here?" I said.

She shivered still more, and replied, timidly, "No stranger has been here, Reginald."

"What!" said I; "no one up the walk from the bridge?"

She looked frightened, again shuddered, and, gazing with her large eyes in my face, she repeated, "No stranger has been here."

I looked at her earnestly. Her eyes drooped; she was ghastly pale.

"Well, my dearest," I said, "let me muffle you well; you are very imprudent in so exposing yourself to the damp air."

I wrapped her large shawl around her; from one of its folds there fell on the ground a glove. It dropped from behind; and she did not see it. I picked it up and concealed it. It was a lavender kid glove that had been worn by a man.

I will not speak much of my feelings that night. Hundreds of trivial things came rushing and crowding into my memory—half of them, each of them, confirmation that the worst was true of her.

Her dejection and frequent weeping over the letters, were now accounted for. Had she not often and often withdrawn from me in the evenings, and staid there alone, returning with evasive excuses? Had I not seen her, more than once of late, drop a letter into the receiving-box of the bridge-office, when she might have put it in my writing at the house? Had I not seen her nervously starting at the slightest noise, when seated in the twilight at the window in her little sitting-room which overlooked the garden?

She walked into the house before me and I had time to collect myself. I pleaded headache, and retired into my library. She knew that I never could bear the presence of any one when ill, and I was safe from intrusion there. Amidst the whirling dance of my maddening thoughts no idea of revenge on her had any part. I don't believe in the commonly-received opinion that real love can turn readily into hate. I could not hate her. I even thought with pity of the unmanly part she could not fail to be hers in this world for evermore.

But how—he escape me! No. How best to prevent? Should I, by a sudden journey groom, who must from the stables have sometimes witnessed their stolen interviews?" No, my instincts revolted at the idea of such a step. I decided I met her, on angel though she was. I would do it all myself. My plans were soon formed. Early next morning I rode to one of the servant-and sent back, by my servant, a note to my wife, stating that I was compelled to start for the city that moment to make some arrangements for my voyage, and that I should be absent at least a week. I then went to town, purchased a light-colored wig, a large pair of green spectacles, disguised myself as a sailor and a large beard and mustache, returned to our village, where I engaged apartments opposite the post-office. From there I commenced the watch.

Three days after my supposed departure my wife's confidant came to the shop kept by the postmaster. Previous to her entering the shop I saw her drop a note into the letter-box. After a few minutes' delay in making purchases she drove off again.

Late in the afternoon a tall, distinguished-looking man, with moustache and cap, peak closely drawn down over his face, entered the shop. I felt this to be my enemy. I saw him receive a letter from the postmaster, and hastily walk away. I hurried to the shop, and in broken English asked if there were letters for Mr. Thirl? She replied in the negative. I then hurriedly requested her to look over all the letters. This was in order to gain time for a question or two.

I inquired if it was that fine-looking man who had just gone out of the shop? She didn't know; he was a stranger. But was not his name on his letters? Oh yes; that gentleman was Mr. Thornton, but he didn't live in the village. Had he been long in the habit of coming for letters? Not very long.

I walked forth in the direction of my house. It was nearly dusk when I came within sight of that spot where my wife's fall had been. Over the wet spongy fields, over crumbling fences, through swollen water-courses, I had come, but danger and fatigue were alike unfelt. I came to a halt from the house I saw a horse tied up to a fence. I knew it with her then.

I hid myself close to the bridge for a while until darkness should conceal my movements. I then hurried across and approached the summer-house accidentally. Voices were there. No. 1 knew whose they were in the house then. I was not long left in indecision as to my next step. The window of her sitting-room was open, and there they stood, within a few yards of me, his arm thrown round her waist. I heard him, I saw him kiss her; I heard her kiss him. I heard her passionate "Good-by," and then, with the noiseless step of fate, I hastened by a near cut to the bridge.

I crossed it, shoved the ends of three planks off their supports so that the slightest weight should tilt them over, and waited about ten yards off, with a heart whose throbs I could not drown in even the angry flood.

His cue. He made a few steps along the bridge. Then a wild cry, a dashing of wood together, a plunge in the torrent, an interval of silence, another wild cry, "Help!" Then all was still. I was avenged. No mortal could escape out of that rock-banked stream in its then state.

Next morning I returned to my wife. "Caroline," I said, "I was close to you when you and he parted last night. I saw every thing. He shall pass no more in this world forgive you."

I left at once in a ship bound for Bengal. The events of the past few weeks had made such a wreck of me in both mind and body that there were not in my fellow-passengers who thought me insane. I can not describe the agony of my life during those few days. Only the knowledge that I never saw her or life was with me ever. And, so closely was the memory of her entwined with my being, his face was always before me, that I almost felt as though were a ghastly frown, which grew into a menace.

One evening, it was at sundown, a man fell overboard. The ship was going free, and there was a stiff breeze. As the man passed the quarter—or rather, as the quarter passed him—it was plain that he could not swim. A sudden impulse seized me; I snatched a life-buoy and leaped overboard. The helpless seaman and myself were left together. I remember seeing the cormorants sweeping about our heads, and a boat putting forth from the ship.

The next three months I remained in London to see is of our presence on board a whaler which had picked us up. We were forwarded by the first passing vessel to our destination. The tedium of business arrangements connected with my recent inheritance was a partial relief. But my fortune was no solace to the bitter past. After two years of objectless life I went to Australia. Here, a few days after my arrival, in the course of my travels I came to a creek where I stopped to bathe. I had just alighted when a horseman passed me at a rapid pace. He wore a red Garibaldi shirt, and a helmet hat with a red silk "puggaree" streaming behind it. He had hardly disappeared over the brow of the hill on the opposite side of the creek when two shots were heard, followed by a shout. I spurred my horse over the creek, and in a few seconds beheld the person who had passed me overthrown, his leg pinned to the ground by his horse, which was down, and a man in a mask, about a dozen yards off, taking aim at him with a revolver. The red horseman and the bush-ranger fired simultaneously, and the robber swerved in his saddle, but he came very close to the other and unhorsed his revolver again. I took a long shot, the robber's pistol fell to the ground, his right arm dropped at his side, and, uttering a howl of rage and pain, he galloped off toward the scrub.

When I reached the fallen man, and unhorsed him, he said, gayly, "Well, by Jove, that was much and got! Your shot went by me, Sir, and a better shot with a revolver I never saw!"

"Who could your assailant have been?" said I.

"Oh, one of Mickey's gang, I suppose. They've become very troublesome lately, and don't scruple to take life. I am certain I hit the scoundrel, but, by Jove, Sir, you have given him a stinger. Your arm is not far from this, and I beseech your company."

We soon came to his tent.

"Now then, Bob, look sharp about dinner!" Bob looked sharp, and we soon seated at a table, on which we saw kangaroo-" steamer," bronze-winged pigeons, and a kangaroo-" tail soup" of delicious flavor. Nor were welcome liquids wanting. There was sparkling Hock, Sherry, and pale brandy.

After dinner we lighted our pipes (I had), and he became very communicative.

"I have made a pot of money pounds," he said, "and no one could believe how lucky I have been. If riches could give happiness, I ought to be one of the happiest men in the world. But I am not.

He said this with a deep sigh, and smoked meditatively. I listened to him with great attention. A true young fellow he was; a wanderer like myself. He had evidently been reared as a gentleman, and bush-life had not made him forget his early habits.

"Have you never been in America?" he inquired, after a pause in our conversation.

"Often," I said, "on visits."

"In what part principally?"

"Many. The last I visited was New York."

"Indeed! I know many families in that city. Did you ever meet a Mrs. Ayres?"

"I have."

His tone spoke of her husband. "He was the noblest of men," said he, "although I only knew him through others."

As he said it, he seemed much agitated and took a glass of wine, a second, and a third. For the last few moments a dim presentiment had been creeping over me which plunged me back into the horrible past.

"Poor Caroline, poor Caroline!" he said, in a tone which I can never forget, "she was left in such a sad scamp, and a disgrace to my family; but soon, or later the truth will be known. She was my favorite sister. I was the youngest brother, and was spoiled. I went to India, took to gambling, took to drink, and at last proceedings were taken against me for forgery. I was wholly unprincipled. A comrade informed me privately that there was no chance of my acquittal; so I made my escape, he furnishing me with the money. I left England under a feigned name, and I saw my father, who would not receive me, saying that every mail from India contained shocking accounts of my conduct, which had broken my sister's heart and his. I went to my sister Caroline, saw her in private often, but never could reveal myself to her because in case to her husband. He was too honorable a man, she said, to screen me from justice as an outlaw, and he would, she was sure, deliver his own brother up to what he believed to be merited punishment. She had not seen me for years, and I resolved to leave the kingdom, and we parted with great tenderness, for she did not believe me guilty. But on that dismal evening I laid me down in the bitterness of evil, and she was nearly right, for, on my crossing a foot-bridge that led from the garden, part of the planking gave way, and I was plunged in the water, a perfect torrent. Although a good swimmer, I must have perished but for one of the planks that had fallen with me, and which I was able to cling to this, and was landed, much bruised, a mile down the river. I reached the city, and wrote to her before I started, telling her of my conduct, and asking her a reply the day before sailing, which much distressed me. Judge my feelings when I have brought a great grief upon me. I think and hope I am going to the grave."

"Most merciful Heaven! Oh, most merciful Heaven!" I cried. "Look at this, Mowbray, Sir!"

With trembling hands I pulled out a miniature from my bosom, and held it out to him"

"My sister Carry!" cried he.

"It is the picture of your wife, James Mowbray," said I. "I am Reginald Aspen."

I thanked God that he had saved me from murder, and had given me back my brother. Yes, she was stainless, and these two years of sad perplexity had had no deeper cause than my wife's reluctance to reveal to me the supposed dishonor of her brother. We returned to America, and soon learned that the comrade who had really committed the forgeries had confessed them on his death-bed. For long and peaceful years James Mowbray has been the honored guest of our happy home. Pleasant evenings he ever has are with two young chubby cognies and one little girl, the two former bearing respectively the names of James and Reginald—the latter that of Carry.

ST. VALENTINE'S DAY.

THE VALENTINE.

THE warm yellow sunlight slants into the room
Through the window where fair Cousin Marian stands;
On her cheek just a shade of the rose's rich bloom,
And my valentine held in her hands.

WITH what care I selected the paper, cream laid,
Edged with gilt, spiced with perfume, stamped extra fine;
And the lines which I wrote—never poet yet made
A verse full of passion like mine.

FROM behind the dark curtain I follow her eyes—
Ah, never was maiden on earth half so fair!
And I doubt if the angels which dwell in the skies
Have such waves of bright gold in their hair.

HER lips, like the curve in young Cupid's little bow—
I could never find out what crimson was nearest akin—
Are just parted a trifle, sufficient to show
The twin rows of pearls in between.

RIGHT before the broad window, and 1 to one side,
Her face half in shadow, in outline the rest,
And a pink-colored ribbon, coquettishly tied,
That I chose with such care at the best.

ON the little round table between us are thrown
Her hat and her shawl, but this moment laid by
From a walk in the park, for this once quite alone;
Did she wander where'er was I?

HOW often I've wished that I might be a flower,
Her favorite geranium there on the stand,
To be touched with delight and caressed every hour
By the touch of her dear little hand;

OR worn in the bright braid which covers her ear,
Those bits of bright jet to cross her soft cheek;
But alas! if I were she never might hear
The love which I never could speak.

SHE hears the last line with the faintest of sighs,
Her color turns deeper and mounts like a flame;
Like to two brimming wells are her sweet azure eyes,
And her lips softly murmur my name.

I step from the curtain, I clasp her slight waist;
Her bright little head droops adown on my breast;
I lift it, I kiss her, my manners are rude—
Never mind, you may guess at the rest.

CLEMENT CAREW.

A STORY IN FOUR CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER III.

WELL, one day my master told me he had got me a situation. I was engaged to wait on the steward's room at the Earl of Normanbury's.

"NOW, Clem," said he, with his honest eyes looking full into mine, "you have your future before you. With some boys I might feel a doubt whether I had done right in saying nothing of the past to this steward: with you I have none. I know that you will keep your promise to me."

"I will, Sir."

"I trust that you will live down the evil that has attached to your name, and make yourself a new and upright character."

"God helping me, Sir, for trusting me. I will."

I went to my place, and found it a hard one. The ladies and gentlemen of the steward's room were difficult to please. I have waited on many real ones since, and found them considerably less so. But the set at Normanbury Park was a tip-top set, and Mr. Latchup the steward took care to inform me the very first day. "Every think in my apartments is mest beleaguer," said he; "I'll see to that myself. We have things first-rate, we have; and of course are waited on according. His lordship ain't half as particklar how he's served as I am for my ladies and gentlemen." And this was true. I found, too, that the steward's boy was expected to do pretty nearly the whole work of the establishment, and to "do it willing." "None of yer hidle airs here!" the second footman said to me one day, when I remonstrated against some special work of his. "Who are you, pray, to talk to me about trouble? Why, a whipper-snapper like you has no call to know the meaning of the word."

I had no proper name in that house. I was "Buttons" to "Loot!" to "Young Shaver!" to "Whipper-snapper!" to "Butter-fingers!" to "You Booby!" to "Lazybones!" to "Now, Stoopid!" to "Great Gawk!" and a dozen other such flattering appellations. I was bullied, cuffed, sworn at, ridiculed, abused. My eyes were apostrophized in a manner far from complimentary. My waistcoats and vulgarity were a theme for continual comment. I had work and kicks in plenty, but no love. It was undeniably a hard place.

Mr. Latchup was a great man in every sense of the word; more than six feet high, and large in proportion. His personal manner, used grand language, and walked the floors grandly. They trembled under him, so did I. Nature seemed to me to have made a mistake in his case, and while he ought to have been the Earl of Normanbury, that noble man, a little bald-headed personage, who sneaked about the house as though he was afraid to meet his own servants, should have been the steward. I saw many strange things there, which opened my mind not a little. I saw the contrast between the meritorious table of a great man—abundant—and the meagre fare of a poor curate, though the latter was a gentleman born and bred. I saw the waste, the airs, and extravagance of this pampered part of society, who eat and don't pay. I saw the jealousies, the heart-burnings, the contentions, the love-making, that went on in those luxurious lower regions; and I saw a great deal more that I won't even allude to here. For, although I was "Stoopid!" and a "Booby!" I had eyes, and used them.

In course of time, by dint of cuffs and hard names on the part of those ladies and gentlemen, and hard trying on mine, I had learned my business pretty thoroughly, and they were good enough to keep me tolerably well up to it. Mr. Latchup sometimes condescended to say I was not a bad sort of young fellow, take it together, though decided low. And that was my calamity. It was not every one as was born with such genteel ideas, nor how could it be expected of the lower orders? Of course not.

But in sixteen months there came a thunder-clap. The butcher in B—— whose meat I had stolen had married a sister of Mr. Latchup, and, as ill luck would have it, Lord Normanbury being absent, the bride and bridegroom thought proper to take her brother in their way home after their wedding trip, and were, of course, luxuriously entertained in the steward's private apartments. The instant I beheld Mr. Lardner's face I knew my fate. His look of horrified surprise was quite enough for me.

How shall I describe the commotion that ensued? Every servant flew to examine his or her possessions; every decanter was locked up. Mr. Latchup, fortunately for me, nothing was missed. The very coalscrymaid couldn't say but what her things were right enough—and what a misery, even when they might have been' all pick-pocketed and murdered in their beds, and never known nothing about it.

That afternoon I was summoned to Mr. Latchup's private apartments, who, looming vast and tremendous, thus addressed me:

"Well, this here's a pretty go, this is. Now look here, and listen to me, young shaver. I don't deny but what you've behaved respectable on the whole while here, setting aside your vulgar ways, which you can't help, for you're born so; the low orders act. But the ladies and gentlemen 'ye see? as frequents these apartments ain't accustomed to the society of thieves, nor yet of the swell mob, do ye see? and of course they couldn't think of putting up with it. And stealing a beggarly piece of soap meat! Yah! —so low. Consequently, I expect the commission would go. Immediate. But you'll be treated handsome—that's my principle with the lower classes. Your mouth's wages and board wages. And I'll tell you what, to come upon me for a reckmendation, because I can't give none. The responsibility would be too tremendjous."

I had worked hard—struggled hard—borne much in that house, all in the hope of redeeming my character, and having gone through it with good master. I sneaked out of it like a convicted thief (as I was), with swollen eyes, a bursting heart, and a character blasted. Yet I was to forgive Philip!

I never thought of a dishonest life now—that time was past. I would go to my master, and lay my sorrow before him.

Alas! sorrow had been there before me. His little child had died some months previously of scarlet-fever, and he himself was dying now of rapid decline, the consequence of a cold caught one bitter night in attending his little darling. His sweet wife came down, and told me these tidings with a pale, sad face, but without a tear. She had wept them away. Her heart was broken, and she seemed to have no tears left. The doctor had ordered him to see no one for long together; but when he heard that I was, naturally enough, in great grief, he must come in at once. Ah! how changed—how wan—how wasted was the dear face! But it had a holy, heavenly light, which I feared with confusion. Nothing would change those, I thought, but death.

And I had not been long with him before he had comforted me so, that for the time, at least, I almost forgot my grief.

He said he, Sir, when he had listened to my tale with breathless interest, "it is hard, it is hard. But it is all right, nevertheless, as you'll know some day. You've been tempted five years, bearing him to better myself again by going to a widow lady of rank as upper footman, with a considerable increase of wages. I met with her I became engaged to a young fellow-servant, who, although decidedly above me in rank (she was my lady's own maid), allowed herself to be touched by my devotion and sincerely returned it. Fanny Pearson was remarkable for her beauty, but still more for her steadiness. She was very young and too poor to marry then of course (I was but six-and-twenty, and she a twelvemonth younger), that as soon, with my lady's good recommendation, as we should have saved enough to make it prudent we would set up in business of some kind as man and wife.

Nearly ten years had now passed since the event I have related, and I did long to see the lovely face the hated evil down. But I never forget it. A thrill of horror would often dart through me as I went about with my tray, and should feel if that discrace should ever reach to Fanny's ears. Yet sometimes I half resolved to tell her the whole, for I doubted whether my honest, whether it was justifiable to keep from her such a fact. But I had not the courage to risk losing one I loved so dearly. I pondered many times, but I held my peace.

When I had been rather more than three years in my lady's service certain family changes obliged me to break up my establishment and join her son on the Continent. In announcing to me this necessity, not without expressing great regret at parting with me, my lady was pleased to help me to a far better and more lucrative place than her own, of most any that I thankfully accepted the charge of a young relative's companion to Mr. Grant, a friend of hers in London, who was looking out for a very steady man-servant to take charge of his son, a boy of fifteen, and principals to try me. I found Mr. Grant the most fussy and suspicious of mortals. He seemed to do every thing, to be on his guard at all points, to be never tired of blessing his own soul and body. After my second interview with him he went on a long string of questions as long as my arm, and appointed me a third time to learn his final decision. I went and was engaged. My lady's name was a host in itself, more than satisfactory. "Bless my soul and body! quite out of the way!" —and he handed me a note to take at once to my future master. Mr. Hauway's was the servant he had engaged for her. As I was about to leave the room a footman, entering, informed him that the person who had called to enquire after Miss Grant was in the parlor. "Again!" Mr. Grant exclaimed excitedly. "Bless my soul and body! Show me in!" and running out into the hall, his servant and I following more leisurely behind, he found the person in question standing there hat in hand and exclaimed, "Bless my soul! here again! Why, I thought I told you I had nearly engaged a person—subject to character, of course! But that's turned out first-rate, and now I have engaged him."

"Very good, Sir. I beg your pardon—I only called just for the chance," a civil voice replied that made my blood run cold. Till then Mr. Grant had hid the speaker from my sight; but now, as he turned to leave him, we suddenly stood in full view of one another. It was Philip Steele. Handsome, well dressed, almost gentlemanlike in appearance—Philip Steele.

My blood rushed to my heart and brain; yet my senses were rather sharpened than otherwise, and I was able to observe him narrowly. He made one very respectful bow to Mr. Grant, another to me. Grant, "May I venture to ask if that is the person you have engaged, Sir?"

"Bless my soul! yes, it is!" that gentleman replied, in a fever, directly. "Why? why? what? Bless my soul! what?"

"Because it is right to inform you, what you are probably not aware of, that that person, Clement Carew, was convicted of theft some years ago, and sent to prison."

Mr. Grant started as though he had been shot, and stared at him, trembling in every joint.

"Bless my soul! Bless my soul! And body! In prison!"

"He will not deny it himself, Sir, if you will kindly ask him."

He spoke with apparent reluctance, as though fulfilling an unpleasant duty.

Mr. Grant turned to me. "Is this true?" he cried literally dancing about in the extremity of his horror.

He need not have asked. The truth was written in my face. I knew that I was white as the letter I held in my shaking hand. I was guilty; and looked so.

I returned him that letter without one word. Words would not have come just then.

"Bless my soul! but this is shocking, you know!" Mr. Grant cried, his face shining with perspiration; "this is—this is shocking! I—I mean I had actually engaged for that poor helpless lady! With such a character! To deceive one so! Bless my soul and body! I'm sure," turning to Philip, who stood there apparently unmoved, "I'm sure I'm infinitely indebted to you for having—"

But here words came to me, pouring forth from my bursting heart like a torrent.

"Yes, you are indebted! Yes, he spoke truth! I was sent to prison for theft—and I am him! I did steal a few pounds of meat to save my mother from starving! my mother who had nursed him day and night through a fearful fever, and saved his life at the risk of her own!"

Then I turned and confronted him with glaring, murderous eyes.

"This is the second time you have denounced, destroyed me; and I will not! I don't care you from him, where you stand, it's not for your sake, nor yet mine, but for one I won't even name in your hearing. Then, if you've had your turn twice—the third may be mine!"

And dashing furiously past him, as he sprang aside, scared and astonished, out of my way, I threw myself on the door, and darted from the house.

I ran as I had run the day of the theft—as though I might be pursued by the same disgrace. I never stopped till I had reached my lodging. I tore through the little shop—past the astonished greengrocer and his wife, scrambled upstairs to the counter—up into my own room, and locked myself in like a hunted creature. Hunted! I was hunted by the cry of my own deed! That cruel deed found me out again—dragged me down as it would always do—as those thieves had said it would! I was lost! forever!

All that day I sat there immovable—trying to think—a dull sense of agony weighing me down! But it was hard to think. I had no strives for the right—so resisted every temptation to even trivial faults—so prided myself on my honest name —on the trust placed in me! so gloried in my lady's high recommendation! And now disgraced! publicly proclaimed a thief! For Mr. Grant's nervous head never paused; and Mr. Grant himself would of course inform my lady. Fanny would know it! I covered my face with my hands, and moaned aloud, in spite of that. I longed to die—to throw myself into the river, and end it all. There was no grace for me on earth—no hope! "Lost forever, lost!" What would the master say now? He would have no forgive him, no doubt! Forgive him! I never could—for destroying him, then I would forgive him now.

For three days I never moved from that room; the first night I never went to bed at all, but lay through the dark hours, motionless, staring at the sky, like one in a dream. The woman of the house, alarmed at my strange behavior, came to try to get room several times, bringing food by way of excuse, and, to rid myself of her importunities, I tried to eat. On the third morning she found a letter. It was from Fanny. I opened it mechanically; too well I knew what it would, what it must contain. And I was not deceived. All was at an end between us. I could not be surprised, she wrote, at her refusing to keep to an engagement made in the ignorance of my former life. She would try and forgive the cruel wrong I had done her, the deception I had practiced, and I should have her prayers. But she must bid me farewell.

I sat gazing vacantly at this letter as it lay open before me, altogether unconscious of the full meaning of the letters, and lingering in the room watching me. At last she spoke.

"We've been here before partickler, me and Sprags have, about the lodgers we've took in, and never done a unjust thing by no one—not since we set up in the green-grocery business."

I looked up. I did not even comprehend her meaning.

"I'p'ups it'd be pleasanter for all parties if you was to suit yourself," she said, bluntly. "It's best to be straightforward, and so I tell ye."

I understood her now. Oh, she had heard it!

Like one recovering from a long illness, feeble and sore smitten, I tottered from that place, and went out into the cold, hard world again. I wandered far away into one of the humblest quarters of the town, and engaged the first poor room I could find. I had plenty of money. For a long time past I had been saving every penny I could spare with a precious object—I had saved for Fanny.

Not long after I fell seriously ill, and for a time I hoped that death would relieve me of my sufferings. But Providence had other things in store for me.

After many months, being forced work by a neighboring carpenter, who accidentally discovered my knowledge of the trade, I accepted it, more from a need of some occupation than from actual poverty. Then followed weeks, months, years of colorless, monotonous existence, during which I performed mechanically the tasks set me, held no communication with any one that I could shake hands with or speak, almost hated myself; an existence without interest, without sympathy, without forgiveness. For I lived upon my resentment. I brooded over it. I renewed it day by day. I was forever picturing to myself with vindictive delight the vengeance I would wreak on that interloper if I could. I longed that I were but free to injure, as I considered I was to other him. For my promise to my master was no longer binding in my eyes. No being in his senses could expect me to do other than hate Philip Steele now.

I pass over the rage, dreadful and godless as they were. In my desolation I did sometimes utter the Publican's prayer; but I never went to church; I never knelt down for five long years. I dared to be angry with my Great Creator. I writhed under an unmerited sense of injustice. I thought myself a hunted, doomed, accursed creature, shut out from all sympathy and love—utterly and forever alone.

A mistaken idea has generally himself to blame full as much as the world. I see now that much of what I endured at that time I might have spared myself. If, instead of flying from the struggle, I had fought on, as Mr. Penrhyn once advised, I should have won my way at last. For I had friends, who valued and would gladly have served me. My lady had taken no end of pains to sift my story, and had sought out every where before she and Lucy went abroad. Dean Tudor had done the same, bearing strong and willing testimony in my favor; and had, by the way, my dear mistress, when she learned from him what had chanced, never ceased to make inquiries for me. But I had left no trace in my apparent desire to hide myself from all the world I had changed my very name, and the words of kindness and encouragement that would have raised my fainting spirit were never spoken. So five dreary years passed by, and at thirty-one I was an old man in heart, and in outward appearance. But long before that time I had engaged these premises and set up on my own account. I had a most satisfactory if never suffering a business hours to cross my threshold except on business—in encouraging the belief that I was crazed, though harmless.

One evening I was returning home after a long walk, when my attention was arrested by a crowd that surrounded a humble door-step in a street not far off. I did what I had not done for months—I might say years before—I addressed myself, of my own accord, to a fellow-creature, and inquired what was the matter. "A man either dead or dying," was the reply. "A case of starvation, they say." I could scarcely account for the impulse that induced me to approach, and as I did so the crowd partially opened. "Has any one ever a drop of brandy?" a bystander inquired, looking round. I had. I always carried a small flask of it in my pocket, being subject to a sort of spasm, at times, then, following in his wake as he pushed his way back again, stooping down at last over an object on the step, which lay partly form concealed. "I have got his mouth open," I heard him say. Then there was a buzz of voices.

"Yes—yes—he swallowed."

"He's not dead."

"Ain't he?"

"No. He did swallow."

"There! he's swallowed some more—plenty—no—he's not dead."

"That's enough—don't give him no more now."

And the policeman raised his tall figure and returned me the flask. In doing so he moved a little on one side, and disclosed the form of the dying man. He was pale as death, his features attenuated, his clothes travel-stained and torn, his hat fallen off, his matted together, his whole appearance ghastly in the extreme. But there was no mistaking the features.

I advanced a step or two to make sure of the fact. I gazed at him. I gloated over him.

"I knew I could then, 'mines enemy?'" I felt wardly exclaimed.

Yes, I had found him, as my utmost malice could have wished him found. He was in my power now. Oh joy unspeakable! Revenge at last!

The brandy had so far restored him that he showed signs of life, though still insensible. The police were talking of conveying him to the station-house, but I interfered.

"I know this man well," I said. "Bring him to my house. He is a—I will see to him myself."

As they carried him after me it occurred to me to ask my self why I should do with this enemy of mine now that he had fallen thus unexpectedly into my power. But I put off that consideration for the present. But one hot got him home? It is the silence and solitude of my own house I would decide what to do with him.

He was borne through this shop—up these stairs—and laid on my bed. Then some one volunteered to go for a doctor; and before you would have thought it possible one had arrived—a young man with a shrewd, care-worn countenance —and was in full examination of the case. He shook his head over it. He doubted the patient's surviving the night. There had been recent terrible illness, he saw clear—fever probably; and that with want of food and overfatigue, had so prostrated the physical powers that he doubted their rallying at all. He would send medicines, however, to be administered according to the directions given, and on the care with which these were obeyed would probably depend the last chance of life. There ought to be constant watching, giving of occasional stimulants, and, later, food in very small quantities. Did I require a nurse? He could send a good one immediately.

No, I required none but a nurse. I shrank from the idea of such a spy upon my actions. I said I would do all that was necessary for the man myself.

Looking at me with that keen, almost suspicious eye of his, he remarked that he would call again in the morning and hastily left the room. I felt as I should want him sooner, repeated his injunctions as to care, and departed.

I managed, not without difficulty, to undress the unconscious form, and lay it inside the bed; and having done so, went down to prepare myself some supper. I felt I must both eat and drink; strength might be required for what I had to do. Presently a boy brought the medicines—a dozen bottles, in which we trifles, "to be taken immediately;" on the other, "A sixth part to be taken every two hours." I carried both up stairs with my own hands, and sitting down by the bed, began, for the first time, to think!

Thank Him, was my enemy at my mercy. The man who had twice blighted my life, destroyed my character, was in my power. I had but to throw these medicines, every drop of them, out of window, and he would die; the doctor had said so again and again. And I should be revenged. He had made my life a living death, and I should be quit as a matter of fact. And no creature would know. I should be safe from all risk of detection—alone in the house with him—the key in the door. His illness left him weaker in mind than in body. Drink had been his bane. He had had no less than three attacks of delirium tremens since I set eyes on him before I found him. And even now, though harmless and affectionate—and who can say how grateful!—he is not to be trusted. Why, for he can not resist temptation, and the least drop of drink upsets and drives him wild. He helps me in the shop, and reaches over the counter with a great devotion. He is out at this moment with our eldest girl—just seven—and will have kept her from the rain at the expense of a penny omnibus. In the night-school I have organized, and which is one of my greatest pleasures, he is full of infinite service. And there is not one of the boys from the shop but may not know my story. For I am a living proof myself of the strength of early impressions. And I should not like to make them of use to others too. They may disappear for a time and be forgotten; but, like invisible ink, they come out in the glow of fire, and in the hour of temptation or suffering, and remain indelible. And many a lad has been lost after once failing for want of a strong hand to help him up again, when a cheery voice like my dear master's to say "Fight on! Fight on! Live down the evil you have done, and make yourself a new and upright name!"

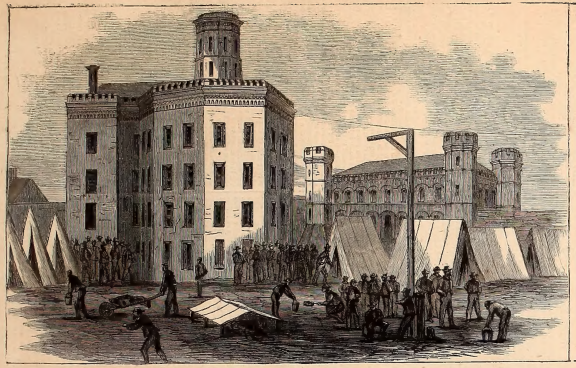
WOMEN IN PARAGUAY.—Every lady here smokes in Paraguay, and nearly every female above thirteen years of age does the same. Even children of six years old have a cigar or tobacco in their mouth, keep it there constantly except when eating, and when playing will a about with it in their tongue and suck it. Only imagine yourself about to salute the fair sex here, and you perceive a lady, who is arrayed in satin and flashing with diamonds. She puts you back with out ceremony, and with the tips of her taper fingers of the other she draws forth from her mouth a green-bluish cigar, which is dripping with saliva, and offering like a monstrous grub, and depositing the savory morsel in your hand. Of course, you gote up for fire, and is ready for your salute. We have sometimes seen an overdressed foreigner, who, in order to avoid the necessity of such circumstances, and get the epithet of unsocial (the worst epithet in Paraguay), has offended beauty by their sensitive squeamishness. However, one soon gets used to this in Paraguay, and considered impolite if declined, and to kiss every lady you are introduced to; and one half you meet are really introduced to render you useful on many consequences. You would nip the dee of the predicted lips on the face of a Paraguayan lady, as the Spaniards call the "honey-dew" of our Virginia.

PEPPERS AND SALT.—Recently a singular incident occurred at the Cafe Francais in 1810, at the corner of the Rue Lepelletier. A celebrated banker of Paris was dining there, all the persons who were seated at dinner. He boasted of his courage, and declared his determination to kill a certain duke, or any gentleman present, disguised as such, brought insolence, quietly walked up to this dare-devil, and addressed him in the most polite manner. The unknown customer, perhaps you will accommodate me by being good enough to hand me the salt?" The banker was struck as Forte Maillet, an mid-day to-morrow; and, to cut his story short, he did not dare to refuse, and he fled from the proverb and pistols." The duelist began to demur, saying that he did not know the gentleman, and that he was the vulgate of M. de ——; to which the gentleman replied: "I have done my duty as a member of civil society at a dangerous follow like yourself, and would recommend you before you give the challenge to inquire of the waiter, before insulting the body, who left Paris the following day, and never more set foot in the public.

FOURTH OF JULY FROLICS.—The most extraordinary and the most unusual instance of the combination of patriotism, perseverance, says Coleridge, is related of the founder of the Foley family. Foley was a fellow in a fellow in a fellow near Stourbridge, was often witness of the longsome labor and loss of time in the manufacture of iron rods, necessary in the process of making nails. The discovery of the means of rolling those rods into bars was made in Sweden, and the consequence of this advance in art were most disastrous to the Stourbridge manufacturers. Nevertheless, Foley the fiddler was shortly missed from his accustomed seats, and was found to be occupied in the forge, which he assiduously resorted to ascertain by what means the process of spinning into bars was accomplished. Without communicating his intention to a single human being, he succeeded in building a furnace without funds, worked his passage to the Swedish iron port. Arrived in Sweden, he hired and fiddled his way into the favor of iron masters. After a long time, he became a universal favorite with the governor; and, through all the vicissitudes, never entirely disappeared from among his kind friends as he had appeared—he and his violin—at their festivals. The news came to England he communicated his voyage and its results to Mr. Knight and his partner, the bridgebuilder, Wilkinson, by whom he was associated, and by whom the necessary buildings were erected. Operations commenced. At the length every thing was prepared it was found that the machinery would not act; at all events, it did not answer the sole end of its erection—it would not split the bar of iron. Foley disappeared again, and it was concluded that shame and mortification at his failure had driven him away forever. Not so: again, though somewhat more speedily, he found his way to the Swedish iron-works, where he was received most joyfully, and, to make sure of their fiddler, he was lodged in the splitting-mill itself. Here was the very end and aim of his life obtained beyond his utmost hope. He examined the works, and very soon discovered the cause of the failure. He now made diverge or rude trestings, and having abided an ample time to gratify his observations, and to strengthen charity and weekly on his mind, he made his way to the port, and once more returned to England. This time he was completely successful, and by the results of his experience established himself honorably beneath the name of Foley.

A CHINESE DINNER.—A traveler recently arrived from Pekin gives the following description of a Chinese dinner: "Tea first comes ushered in by a set of Chinese lower formed of slices of breast of goose and of a fish which the Chinese call mandarin fish, with a kind of pickled turnip and hard eggs of a dark color preserved in lime. Next came greens of pickled wheat and bamboo shoots, well known in Europe, enormous guavas, preserved ginger, and fruits. All these are eaten with ivory chop-sticks, which the guests bring with them. On grand occasions the first dish is always bird's-nest pudding, which consists of a thick gelatinous substance. Small cups are placed round the centre, each containing a different kind of sauce, and every second course was a ragout of sea-snails. At Macao these are boiled, but at Ningpo they are generally eaten raw, and slippery, by no means easy to pick up with small sticks. Other items remarked that of the green tea of the finest kind and hard eggs of a dark color preserved in lime. Next a dish of sharks' fins made from slices of pork and a cock stewed, after these a stew of plums and other fruit, the acidity of which is rendered more agreeable to the taste than that of the dish; then mushrooms, pulse, and duckes' tongues, which are considered the so palm and the most delicious morsel. deer's tendon—a royal dish, which the Emperor himself sends as a present to his friends. Then a dish of ears, a kind of unctuous shell-fish; barley, boiled rice, served in small cups, with the incredible sweet potato, or igname, and other condiments. Last of all tea was served."



A HUMANE SOVEREIGN.—The Berlin journals relate the following anecdote of the King just taken from his throne: "A policeman was at the junction of two lines of railway, the lever in hand, when he saw the express train. He recognized within a few seconds of reaching the embankment. Then the idea occurred to him how easily he could by his role by playing on the rails of the line the train was to pass down. While the thought occurred to him, the unfortunate man dozed a substance resolution. 'He down!' He hooted and on to the child, but to no purpose, it remained at his post. The train passed along on its way, and the cries of the prostrate man were heard no more. It was the poor child! The father rushed forward exerting to take up the child, but he was now his joy completely. Then the boy had at once obeyed his order! He had laid down, and the whole train had passed over him without injuring him. The next day the King sent for the man and attached to his house the salary for civil courage."

FLAYING FOR SINGULAR STAKES.—Strange stakes were sometimes made in the middle ages, as in the early eighteenth century; and among those cite mentioned by Sykes is perhaps the oddest of all. In London, on Christmas Day, at the sign of the Saloon, in October, 1710, a child of Jowen and Elizabeth Jones, aged four years and a half, was flayed, having stoked against the child—by Henry and John R. Trotter, Robert Hughes, and Thomas Wood. There was by the latter, being duly delivered to them. It does not appear what the child and mother thought of the transaction, but as the child was handed over to the parties, we must presume that the parents consented.

PUGILISTIC SKILL.—It is to the credit of the Interior, the Book of Moses, that we find the earliest records of the use of the fighter-ring. In Egypt it appears to have been a sport, used as we now use a written autograph; and it is not a little curious that the unimaged habit of fighting in rounders the custom as common now as it was three thousand years ago. Wilkinson, in his account of Egypt, to which she should again recognize Judah, she made her first request for the head—and then the head of John—presented it was duly and undoubtedly acknowledged by all.

PERSONAL APPEARANCE OF MARIE ANTOINETTE.—Nature endowed Marie Antoinette with a face which had much her an object of admiration. In chapel tall, her movements were swaying and graceful, her countenance of a pleasure such as to less nothing of her majesty; her hair was blonde and lithes, its warm tints reminding the beholder of the wavy tresses of Titian's; a lofty oval forehead, like to the fair daughter of Austria, crowned the face of liquid azure, in which the calm and the tempest of the soul made the look by turns deep or undisturbed; the nose was aquiline, by her family, a mingling of pride and of a smile; the chin turned up; her mouth was beautiful in the expression of the month; an irresistible grace shed like a youthful vapor over all her features, and the whole was set off by her vivacity put through an atmosphere of fire or inebriation.

SICK CHILDREN.—Few things in life are more piteous than the suffering of a sick child. Perhaps, if we came to reason about the matter, we should find a still profounder pathos in the misery of a sick man or woman; for the adult is more conscious of his state and of all that it implies, and is conscious, by the effort of his will, to a sense of duties deferred, of plans broken off, of responsibilities to others rendered impossible of discharge, of an incomplete past and a doubtful future. But on these occasions we do not think much of the pain and the pathos are touched in the case of the child more than in that of the grown-up person, to whom we have the advantage and forms, some but too natural. Childhood we are apt to associate great sensibility to pain, but also with uniform cheerfulness and enjoyment; and, at any rate, there is something extremely pathetic in the sudden eclipse on the lithe activity of a healthy child and the terrible repose or feverish restlessness of a child that is sick or serious ailment. Unfortunately it happens that children are peculiarly liable to certain forms of disease, many of maladies which seem specially prepared for the affliction of those unconscious sufferers. Their delicate organs are unused; and, besides them, the young are subject to many of the complaints which affect the full-grown and mature. Infants, small-pox and vaccine the brain, hooping-cough and diphtheria, are the bane of childhood. The wail for the little creatures even before they can run alone; and, if they are old enough to have learned to speak, by many other ways from day to day. A child, a fall, a fright, a mass of suffering unintelligible to the mother and to bewildered little things which, when the frame grows stronger, are thrown off as the natural incidents of childhood, and the child into weeks of sickness, and not infrequently end in death. If this be the case with children in families, how much more is it so among the poor, whose children—set aside from their parents' care, and left to themselves, often from hard necessity—are left to take their chance in the battle of existence, and to stake a single thought, succeeding or Nature has given them a weak or a sturdy constitution? The mere chance of life often seems a question of getting rid of all sickly infants, as not being fitted for the rough work of life; and the fact that the mortality of our own time and country are compelled to proceed, as a matter of fact, on the same principle. Whether we are not shelter the frail blossoms that need so much artificial warmth and shelter, and to stake a single chance, is a question I they know that they are born to speedy death; and they consider themselves as the ridiculous idea a feeble boy or girl is out of place among the true conditions of their living world, and that it is "all for the best" when they die. But, in the mean while, before the kindly release arrives, the miseries of the poor infants are lamentable to see or to contemplate. Sickness with all the pollutions of exalt to which it gives rise, and with poverty together with insufficient food, with damp and ill-warmed rooms, with the narrow and unwholesome bed, with filthy surroundings, with little or no nurture, and with nothing to relieve the monotony of pain and misery, is a terrible spectacle, which is the fate of thousands of unhappy children around us at the present moment, is indeed one of the saddest episodes in the history of life.

GEN. JOHN C. BRECKINRIDGE.

MAJOR-GENERAL JOHN C. BRECKINRIDGE has just been appointed rebel Secretary of War, in place of SEDDON, resigned. The past political and military career of Mr. BRECKINRIDGE is already familiar to our readers. He was born near Lexington, Kentucky, January 21, 1821; was educated for the profession of law, but at the breaking out of the war with Mexico he entered the military service, though so late that he saw but little active service. Upon his return he was elected to the Kentucky Congress, and in 1851 to the United States Congress. In 1856 he was elected Vice-President, and in virtue of that office became President of the Senate, being the youngest officer who ever held that position. He was nominated for President in 1860 by the extreme Southern party, but was defeated. Elected to the Senate, he held his seat during most of the Extra Session beginning July 4, 1861. Toward the last of the Session he went over to the Confederates, and published a letter stating his reasons for taking this step. He was afterward formally expelled from the Senate for disloyalty.

His military career has not been a remarkable one. He first entered the campaign in Kentucky. He participated in the battle of Stone River, having risen previous to that date to the rank of Major-General. He held an important command in Louisiana in the summer of 1863. On the 5th of August he attacked the Federal garrison at Baton Rouge and was repulsed. His later campaigns in East Tennessee or in Virginia have not brought him any enviable distinction as a military officer. It remains to be seen what he can accomplish as Confederate Secretary of War.

GENERAL N. B. FORREST.

We give above a portrait of Major-General N. B. FORREST, the great cavalry leader of the Confederates in the West. He has been connected with the war from the first, and the most daring of the Confederate raids have been accomplished by his command. He had a brigade of cavalry at Fort Donelson, and to prevent being captured with the garrison he cut his way out with a portion of his command. In our advance southward he has been a most formidable enemy, falling upon our communications, capturing our supply trains, or sweeping down upon some feebly-defended town as he did upon Memphis last summer. It was General FORREST, without doubt, that saved General HOOD'S army from utter destruction, by covering his retreat across the Tennessee.

A MILITARY EXECUTION.

We illustrate on page 109 the military execution of private NEWELL W. ROOT, alias GEORGE H. HARRIS, for the crime of desertion, at City Point, January 27, 1865. It appears that, deluded by General LEE'S Order No. 65, he had made his way through the rebel lines and found his way to Louisa, Kentucky, where he was arrested while attempting to pass himself off as one of their deserters. He was one of 170 misguided men who had deserted to the enemy, and left Richmond on the 10th October last. Seventy of these have already been arrested, fifteen executed, and unrelenting martial law is still on the track of the remainder.

MILITARY PRISONS IN CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA.

We give on page 108 two illustrations representing the prisons in which our officers have been confined in Charleston, S.C. In last August the jail and yard were occupied by six hundred army and navy officers, who were placed under the fire of our batteries on Morris Island. They were occupied at the same time by felons, murderers, lewd women, deserters from both armies, United States colored soldiers, and Southern slaves, most of whom were permitted to walk at will among the officers. When all the federal officers were moved from Macon to Charleston, at the time of SHERMAN'S raid, the Work-house and Roper Hospital had to be used as prisons. Of the former we give an illustration. The Roper Hospital was the finest building ever used for a military prison North or South. Indeed, the officers preferred that the shelling should be ten times as severe than to be removed to any other prison.

EASTPORT, MISSISSIPPI.

We have engraved on page 108 a view of Eastport, Mississippi, General THOMAS'S recent headquarters. The town is situated on the west side of the Tennessee River. General THOMAS'S headquarters are on the hill to the left, early in April, J. SUTRIS's on the steamer Lilly. The Carondelet, Lexington, Neosho, and Gladiator are on the river. The main portion of the town is not disclosed in the sketch, it being situated behind the hill to the left. It is just at the mouth of Bear Creek.

The rebel papers now gone into winter-quarters a few miles south of Eastport, at Tupelo. It will not be long before we shall again hear from General THOMAS.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Perfect Digestion is perfect Health.—Keep the stomach in order and you will have healthy blood, healthy blood, firm nerves, an unclouded brain, and cheerful spirits—in short, perfect health. Let the stomach get a sound body animated by a sound mind. "Ah," says some invalid, "that's all very fine, but I am a martyr to Dyspepsia; my liver is out of order, my bowels are irregular, my head is dizzy and confused, my hands shake, my nerves are flurried; I am tormented with gloomy thoughts by day and disturbed with terrific dreams at night—in short, I feel very ill." Is it indeed so, suffering brother or sister? Then is it indeed fortunate that you have lighted on this notice. HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS will relieve you of your symptoms in a fortnight, if you will but use the assured remedy as directed; and there never was a case of indigestion that could resist it. Time and trial have proved its efficacy. It is a combination of the purest of all stimulants, with the purest Tonic and Aperient Roots that grow, and both of the medical profession of the United States generally are prescribing it. It has almost superseded Quinine as a cure for Intermittent Fever there. In Canada, the Provincial Indian, and Australian dependencies it is becoming with a rapidity wholly unexampled in the history of advertised remedies.

GOLD PENS, OF EXTRA QUALITY, IN SILVER-MOUNTED DESK-HOLDERS.

For $2 75 a No. 4 Pen; for $3 25 a No. 5 Pen; for $4 00 a No. 6 Pen; for $5 00 a No. 7 Pen.

For $7 a No. 8 Pen; for $9 a No. 9 Pen; and for $9 a No. 10 Pen.

The "1st Quality" are pointed with the very best Iridonnia Points, carefully selected, and some of the quality are sold with the slightest imperfection which still and the closest criticism cannot detect.

The "2d Quality" are superior to any Pens made by high-priced makers in this city.

The "3d Quality" he intends shall equal in respect to Durability, Elasticity, and Ease of Writing any Gold Pens only two considerations any Gold Pens made elsewhere.

Gold Pens of all the above qualities, he begs leave to say that previous to operating his New and Patented Machines, he made FIFTY THOUSAND GOLD PENS, and Sold Gold Pens, for the Price, had the Gold been furnished gratuitously.

Parties ordering most in all instances specify the "Name" as the "Number" is Morton's—1st and Gold Pens wanted, and he particular to describe the kind they prefer—whether stiff or flexible, coarse or fine.

All remittances sent by mail in registered letters are at no risk of loss. All Pens sent by mail, unless sent by registering, in addition to the price of goods ordered, I will send postage-stamps to prepay.

Parties sending Gold or Silver will be allowed the full premium on the value received.

TO CLUBS.—A discount of 10 per cent. will be allowed on sums from $20 to $50, and of 20 per cent. on $50, if sent to one address at one time.

No. 25 Maiden Lane, New York.

MERWIN & BRAY FIRE-ARMS CO.'S

Belt and Pocket Size Cartridge Revolvers.

The Belt size weighs 2½ oz., and carries a ball 42-100 calibre and sanding charge. The Pocket size weighs 1½ oz., and can be used with either fixed or loose ammunition. The Merwin & Bray Fire-Arms Co., and carries a ball 30-100 calibre (same as used in the Colt Pocket Revolver).

These Pistols are loaded and discharged with only four motions—a decided advantage in rapidity of firing over any other arm. A full round may be loaded and discharged in thirty seconds. They are manufactured under patents issued to the U. S. Revenue Service. Testimonials of their efficiency and reliability can be seen at the office, and also from civilians. Printed circulars (with illustrated cuts sending stamp), sent by mail on application.

MERWIN & BRAY are also proprietors of the Ballard Breech-Loading Rifle, which needs no further notice or comment. Their high character for Military and Sporting purposes is so well established that it is unnecessary to say to know where they may be purchased. These Rifles were used by Generals Averill and Fisk on the Indian Expedition to the Pacific, under orders of the U. S. Government. Also, by Colonel Wolford's men in Kentucky. Kentucky have about Twenty Thousand (50,000) more in active field service, all of which have these Rifles or have received.

Sold by Wholesale and Retail Dealers generally.

Address orders to MERWIN & BRAY,

No. 353 Broadway, New York.

P.S.—IMPORTANT.—These Rifles can be used with either fixed or loose ammunition.

JUST THE THING FOR SOLDIERS.

SAMUEL BOWLES & CO., ALBUM Manufacturers, Springfield, Mass.

U. S. 7-30 LOAN.

By authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, the undersigned has assumed the General Subscription Agency for the sale of United States Treasury Notes, bearing seven and three tenths per cent. interest per annum, known as the

7-30 LOAN.

These Notes are issued under date of August 15th, 1864, and are payable three years from that time in currency, or are convertible at the option of the holder into

U. S. 5-20 Six per cent.

GOLD-BEARING BONDS

These bonds are now worth a premium of nine per cent., including gold interest from 1st November, which makes the actual profit on the 7-30 loan, at current rates, including interest, about ten per cent. per annum, besides its exemption from State and municipal taxation, which adds from one to three per cent. more, according to the rate levied on other property. The interest is payable semi-annually by coupons attached to each note, which may be cut off and sold to any bank or banker.

The interest amounts to

One cent per day on a $50 note.
Twocents " "	"	$100
Ten " "	"	$500
$1 " "	"	$1000 "
$3 " "	"	$5000 "

Notes of all the denominations named will be promptly furnished upon receipt of subscriptions. This is now offered by the Government, and it is confidently expected that its superior advantages will make it the

THE ONLY LOAN IN MARKET

GREAT POPULAR LOAN OF THE PEOPLE.

Less than $700,000,000 remain unsold, which will probably be disposed of within the next 60 or 90 days, when the entire will be absorbed and the demand a genuine, as has uniformly been the case on closing the subscriptions to other Loans.

In order that the citizens of every town and section of the country may be afforded facilities for taking the loan, the National Banks, State Banks, and Private Bankers throughout the country have generally agreed to receive subscriptions at par, and will furnish their own agents, in whom they have confidence, and who only are to be responsible for the delivery of the notes for which they receive orders.

THE PERPETUAL CURATE.

By the Author of "Chronicles of Carlingford."

8vo. Cloth, $1 00; Paper, $1 00.

From the London Times.

The "Perpetual Curate" is perhaps the most one of the best pictures of Clerical Life that have ever been drawn, and it is essentially true.

From the Westminster Review.

We can truly regard the appearance of a work which bears on every page the evidence of close observation and keen but honest insight, united to dramatic feeling, and a style of unusual eloquence and power.

ARRANDALE & CO., Commission Merchant Agents, No. 207 Broadway, New York, announce that all of the above list of goods will be sold for ONE DOLLAR EACH.

In consequence of the great stagnation of trade in the manufacturing districts of England, through the war having cut off the supply of cotton, a large quantity of valuable Jewelry, originally manufactured for the English market, has been sent off for sale in this country, and MUST BE SOLD AT ONE DOLLAR EACH.

Under these circumstances, ARRANDALE & CO., acting as agents for the above-named European Manufacturers, have received upon a Great Gift Distribution, subject to the following conditions:

Certificates of the various articles are first put into envelopes, sealed, and well mixed; and, when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus giving all an equal chance. On receipt of the certificate you will see what you are to have, and then it is at your option to pay the One Dollar and take the article or not, as you choose may thus obtain a Gold Watch, Diamond Ring, or any of the articles in the list for ONE DOLLAR.

Send 25 cents for Certificate.

In all transactions by mail we shall charge for forwarding the certificate, for delivering, and doing the business, 25 cents each, which must be enclosed when the Certificate is sent for. Certificates will be sent for 5 envelopes for 25; thirty for 50; sixty-five for $10; one hundred for $15.

AGENTS.—We want agents in every regiment, and in every town and county in the country, and to any one of such will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered. If $10 are ordered, the amount remittance must be One Dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, after in each case deducting stamps.

ARCANA WATCH.

An Elegant Novelty in Watches.

The cases of this watch are an entirely new invention, composed of six different metals combined, rolled together and planished, producing an exact imitation of 18-carat gold, called Arcana, which will always keep its color. They are as beautiful and durable as solid gold, and are offered at exceedingly low rates. The case is beautifully designed, with panel and shield for name, with patent pushpiece, and engraved in the exact style of the celebrated Gold Hunting Levers, and are really handsome and desirable, and will stand the imitation of gold as to fashion. The movement is manufactured by the well-known St. Imier Watch Company of Europe, and is a reliable, finished, having engraved patlets, fancy curved bridges, adjusting regulator, Breguet hairspring, compensation balance, fully jewelled action, with fine dial, and skeleton hands, and is warranted a good time-keeper. These watches are made in different sizes, the smallest being for ladies, and are all hunting cases. A case of six will be sent by mail or express for $125. A single one sent in an elegant morocco case for $25. Will furnish agents for these watches at cost. We are the sole agents for this watch in the United States, and none are genuine which do not bear our trade-mark.

THE NATIONAL REVOLVER.

This now celebrated Pistol is the most compact, powerful, and effective Pocket Revolver in the world. It carries the largest ball for the size of the Pistol of any Revolver made. EXTREME LENGTH, 7 INCHES; WEIGHT, 14 OZ.; IN 6-SHOT; 32-100th BALL.

Its Advantages are:

1st. It is loaded with perfect ease and safety, without removing the cylinder or any part of it, at the fore end, and can be carried when loaded without the slightest danger.

2d. The cylinder never fouls; is made from solid steel, bored; and can not get out of repair, or clog, as cylinders made of many parts often do.

3d. The cartridge is made on an improved plan; the following is a description in one phrase, which insures sure fire: IS METALLIC, CENTRAL FIRE, AND WATER-PROOF.

4th. Its peculiar model makes it the most desirable Pocket Revolver ever made.

FOR SALE BY THE TRADE GENERALLY.

GEO. A. HICKOCK, 54 Cliff Street, New York.

Certificates.

I have thoroughly tested the new "National Revolver," and find it an effective weapon, of very fine and convenient size. At fifty yards, I think I could with this Pistol kill every deer. I take pleasure in recommending it as a weapon in every way desirable. In company with Capt. Scott, Provost-Marshal, and other officers, I fired this pistol a large number of times, and not one cartridge failed to explode. (Signed,) JOHN CHARLESTON,

Chief of Police, Cairo, Ill.

We have one of the "National Revolvers" now in use, and pronounce it one of the most perfect things of the kind we ever saw. It is simple in construction, reliable, sure fire, and shoots with the force and accuracy of a rifle. Any one in want of a good and reliable weapon can not do better than procure a "National Revolver."

(Signed,) J. S. VINCENT,

Editor and Proprietor "New Era."

We, the undersigned, have thoroughly and thoroughly tested the National Revolvers, have no hesitancy in saying that, for accuracy, force, and convenience, we think they are far superior to any other Revolver yet produced.

Lands located on both Little Kanawha and Elk Rivers, in the counties of Gilmer and Braxton, in the very heart of the oil regions of West Virginia.

Professor Richardson reports: "Your property is in the very centre of the West Virginia oil regions. It has numerous oil and gas springs along the banks of its streams, one of which vies with the famous 'Burning Spring' itself."

Professor Shepherd, of New Haven, Conn., reports: "I consider it immediately oil-producing land. The oil-bearing strata underlie it extensively, and the long lines of carbonated hydrogen, or illuminating gas springs, some of which I saw burning, as well as the appearance of oil itself on the surface of the tract, fully confirms me in this belief.

"There can be no doubt that along your creeks and tributaries there is a large extent of valuable oil-producing territory. The prodigious amount of bituminous and cannel coal, iron ore, limestone, and fire-clays embodied in the high hills on your property, the huge ridges of which are covered with an extraordinary growth of white oak and other heavy timbers, add immensely to its value."

These views are fully indorsed by the reports of the most practical and experienced men from the oil districts of both Pennsylvania and Virginia.

The Company consider themselves fortunate in having secured the services of Mr. BLACKWELL, a practical civil engineer, for the general superintendency, so well known as the late Chief Engineer and Superintendent of the "Commissioners of Washington Heights," New York City.

Arrangements are in rapid progress for the immediate development of the property on a scale commensurate with its value and extent.

Subscriptions payable at the time of subscribing, or one-half in cash, and the balance in thirty days from the time of closing the subscription, can be made in person or by letter at the office of the undersigned, No. 61 Cedar Street, New York; J. HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. IX.—No. 426.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1865. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1865, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

OPENING OF THE SPRING CAMPAIGN.

The field of military operations is narrowed down to the territory included between the Savannah and the James rivers. There will be military movements in the West, indeed, but not upon a large scale. The resistance which can be made to THOMAS's southward march through Mississippi can not be very great; but it is also true that, depleted as he must be by the transfer of so large a number of his troops eastward, General THOMAS will not be able to undertake the offensive with an army large enough to decide the conflict in the West. Both General GRANT and General LEE are aware that the vital conflict this spring must be in the Carolinas.

The campaign properly opened with the capture of Fort Fisher. The last week's record shows that it is now being vigorously pushed forward south of Petersburg and in the rear of Charleston. TERRY's army also has been largely reinforced, and threatens the capture of Wilmington. The Confederate army in the East is necessarily divided into three parts; one of which defends Richmond, another Charleston, and the third Wilmington, being thus distributed among three States.

SHERMAN's army operating against Charleston has made great progress. After Pocotaligo was captured it was left to General FOSTER, whose army thus becomes a pivot about which BRANCHVILLE and SLOCUM's columns turn northward, with Branchville for their goal. The occupation of Branchville determines the fate of Charleston. Then Charleston takes the place of Pocotaligo, and becomes the pivotal centre in the second stage of the Carolina campaign. The capture of Branchville simplifies the operations of both the Federal and Confederate armies. While it insures for us an excellent base of operations on the coast of South Carolina, it secures for the enemy a more perfect concentration of his force north of Branchville. By the abandonment of Charleston and Augusta several thousand men will be added to BEAUREGARD's army in SHERMAN's immediate front.

The army before Petersburg received marching orders January 31—the same day that SHERMAN moved from the line of the Savannah River. Nothing was accomplished, however, until the 5th of February, except a shelling of the enemy's lines along the Appomattox. At 3 A.M. of the 5th GREGG's cavalry started down the Jerusalem Plank-Road, reaching Reams's Station a little after daybreak. The Fifth Corps followed soon after along the Halifax Road. Further to the west, on the Vaughan Road, the Second Corps was advancing directly on Hatcher's Run. The Fifth Corps was, by a detour around the enemy's extreme right, to take the works on Hatcher's Run in reverse. The Sixth and Ninth Corps were to support the movement. It will be seen that this operation was very similar to the attempt formerly made on Hatcher's Run. GREGG encountered a portion of HAMPTON's cavalry at the crossing of Rowanty Creek. He was supported by the Second Division of the Fifth Corps, and took the bridge, with 22 prisoners. This conflict we have illustrated on page 116. A little west of the creek an empty supply-train, en route for North Carolina, was captured. A scouting party sent up the Boydton Road came upon some deserted camps of the enemy.

The Second Corps in the mean time came up to Hatcher's Run.—MOTT's and DE TROBRIAND's divisions crossed and captured the enemy's breast-works. SMYTH's Division, instead of crossing, turned in a northeasterly direction toward Armstrong's Mills, and soon found the enemy in full force. He then established his connection with MOTT, forming the right of the Second Corps. Upon this portion of the line three severe attacks were made by GORDON and HILL, late in the afternoon, and were repulsed.

During the night the Second and Fifth Corps had established connection with each other, and GREGG covered the left of the latter. On the 6th CRAWFORD's Division (the Third) of the Fifth Corps advanced northward to Dabney's Mills, and succeeded in capturing the enemy's works at that point. CRAWFORD, it appears, pushed on, but the rebels soon made a desperate stand and threatened to cut him off from the main army. This led to a retreat of the Third Division in considerable confusion. The enemy sought to follow up this temporary advantage by an attack on the left of the Second Corps, but was severely repulsed.

BEFORE PETERSBURG—WINTER-QUARTERS FROM THE PLANTATION.—[SKETCHED BY A. W. WARREN.]

POCOTALIGO DEPOT, SOUTH CAROLINA.—[SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

An illustration on page 116, representing a charge made by the First Division of the Fifth Corps, refers to an action which occurred on the morning of the 7th.

The result of the movement, on the whole, has been favorable to us. Our line has been extended a few miles westward, and Petersburg is menaced more seriously than before. We still hold the line of Hatcher's Run.

LYRIC FOR WASHINGTON'S BIRTHDAY.

By WILLIAM ROSS WALLACE.

["When I, an American, living under the Government founded by the immortal Washington, visit his tomb, let me not stand there, a stranger, an alien, by the caprice of a government founded by rebels and traitors."—From a Union Speech, delivered in Union Square, New York, by the Hon. Chauncey Shaffer.]

Words of beauty, power, glory,
How through all the land they ring,
Broad and mighty as the music
Rolling from our eagle's wing
As he battles with the tempest,
Scatters clouds that veil the plain,
So the glorious sun may sparkle
On its hallowed homes again!

What? Americans be aliens
Where his native forests bloom?
Beg permission for an hour
By their mighty father's tomb?

What? resign our rights to treasure
Worshiped by a whole wide world?
See another nation's banner
On the sacred spot unfurled?
Sooner shall exultant Heaven,
When the very noon is won,
Let the tempest fiends of chaos
Rob her kingdom of the sun!
No! ye impious rebels, traitors,
Ye who rend the very Trust
Left by him—no, never, never Shall ye own that dear land!
All Americans shall guard it—
Even ye when Battle's fires
Shall have burnt out of your bosoms
Their disloyal, vile desires!

Words of beauty, power, glory,
Ring along the loyal sod!
Loudly ring as when archangels
Smite the thunder-bells of God—
Bells of warning to the peoples
Who in Truth's white castles dwell,
When their ramparts are assaulted
By the rebel hosts of hell!

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1865.

THE PRESIDENT AND HIS CRITICS.

THAT the President knew exactly what Mr. Blair wished to say to Jefferson Davis —that he is at the bottom of all the movements for peace—that he will flinch and falter when it comes to the point—are assertions made and emphasized by some ardent friends of the Union. The one person they are not sure of is the President. The one thing they doubt is his fidelity, or if not that, then his sagacity. They fill the air with grumblings and growlings, and the newspaper with insinuations, and when they have done all they can to depress and discourage the popular heart they sigh and groan with renewed vigor at the want of persistence which the public displays.

If these gentlemen had but a little of the President's unswerving faith and cheerful sense—if they had but their own moderate share of the steady earnestness of the people, they would spare themselves much dismal croaking and their friends an incessant indignation. What we say true upon a consistent view of the President's whole course is now proved by his own word. In his Message upon the conference he says distinctly that he did not know what Mr. Blair wished to say to the rebels. His word disposes of that assertion. The correspondence he transmits shows exactly how much he thought he was disposed to follow, and effectually annihilates the idle slander that he will betray the national honor in the least degree.

Indeed, nothing but the foolish assumption of four years ago, that Mr. Lincoln was unfit for his office, can excuse such aspersions and reflections upon his honesty and capacity as are implied in the kind of twaddle of which we are speaking. Those who cling to that assumption reveal their disposition to judge of public men and affairs. If there is any man in the country who comprehends the scope of the war more fully than the President, who is he? If any man in the country has shown greater skill and sagacity in dealing with the rebellion, where is he? If there is any public man now living in the United States whom the gossips of which we speak would place in Mr. Lincoln's chair, what is his name? We venture to say that there is no man in our history who has shown a more felicitous combination of temperate conviction, and ability to grapple with a complication like that in which this country is involved than Abraham Lincoln.

When the war began there were impatient people who cried, "Oh, for an hour of Jackson!" But does any man who truly comprehends the character and antecedents of this great struggle, and the infinite patience and wisdom which its settlement of its various questions demands, really think that Andrew Jackson's qualities were those which the situation requires? Is the great fact of no significance that the vast and thrilling opposition to the policy of the Administration has crumbled away before the steady development of that policy, and trumbled without the least yielding of the Administration? Is it an incident of no meaning that, in the week of the passage of the emancipation amendment by Congress, S. S. Cox, a representative of a kind of "war Democracy," moves the thanks of Congress to the President, and in the same week the notorious Fernando Wood, the most unscrupulous demagogue and "peace" apostle in the country, declares for strenuous war? Is it nothing that the shrewdest journals of the Opposition, which from the first shot of the war cried out with Horatio Seymour that to touch slavery was to destroy the Constitution, now complacently announce that the Constitution has Amendment was always a "Democratic" measure, and that the Democratic party was always an anti-slavery party? Does any body mean seriously to assert that the entire head of an Administration which, in a country like this, frenzied with party-spirit like ours, torn for four years with a vast sectional civil war, and incessantly menaced with foreign interference, has directed public affairs until the army and navy are every where victorious, and the most malignant opponents of the war now approve it and thank the President, who has carried steadily forward a policy which they have steadily denounced—does any one mean gravely to assert that such a head is a shiftless, undecided man, ready to sacrifice any principle, forever mousing round for peace, and anxious to buy it at any price?

There is no man of all probably who wishes for peace more earnestly than the President. There is certainly no man who is so little likely to surrender any essential point to secure it. The power in the war, which he understands the people to cherish, he has plainly iterated and reiterated. The conditions upon which peace is possible, and without which it is impossible, he has as often repeated. Peace can not be made upon the sly or in a corner. Shall we not say plainly, what every loyal citizen sees with pain, that it is the Tribune, which has so long and nobly fought the good fight against the subversion of the Government by the slave power, that now speaks of peace in a strain of cringing obsequiousness to the slave lords in rebellion, which inevitably suggests that it would be willing to make peace upon terms of concession to those lords which the loyal people and all faithful citizens would reject with scorn?

GENERAL BURNSIDE AND THE MINE.

The explosion of the mine before Petersburg at the end of last July was, in its results, one of the real disasters of the war, because it discouraged the public, and to a degree foolishly disproportioned to the event. It will be remembered that the month of August was one of so general depression that the Chicago Convention felt emboldened to try the issue of election by an appeal to the cowardice of the country. This action at Chicago and the fall of Atlanta dissolved the temporary gloom, and the public mind resumed its natural tone of patience and confidence.

The scape-goat of the failure at Petersburg and of the petulance of the country was General Burnside. Forgetting his brilliant and distinguished services in North Carolina and East Tennessee, forgetting his generous self-sacrifice in regard to the battle of Fredericksburg, which certainly did not leave him culpable; forgetting the history of the intrigues in the Army of the Potomac, in the midst of which the one thing steadily clear was the character of Burnside; the disappointment of the mine betrayed the country into a passion in which the general was most sharply and impatiently condemned.

Those who knew him bided their time. Those who knew his good sense, his soldierly character, his integrity, and his professional skill in services, were very sure it would at last appear that, however severe and deplorable the misfortune, it could not be charged upon his sheer incapacity, and that the hero of Newbern and Roanoke had not suddenly become "a blunderer and a butcher." As for the General himself, he was no more dismayed than by canister, and he stood as firm and calm amidst the pelings of popular misrepresentation as in the storm of shot and shell. "Some of us must lose our lives in this war," said he, "and some of us our reputations. Perhaps a few must lose both." And when he was urged to publish some explanation of the circumstances, he replied smilingly, "When the war is over there will be plenty of time to clean damaged reputations."

But the war is not yet ended and Burnside's reputation is purged. The Committee on the Conduct of the War have reported upon the failure of the mine. Their conclusion is, that the failure is mainly attributable to the fact that the plan of General Burnside, carefully matured, was set aside at the last moment by General Meade, "who had evinced no faith in the successful prosecution of the work, had added to its no contemptible approval, and had assumed the entire direction and control only when it was completed and the time had come for reaping any advantages that might be derived from it."

General Burnside wished to put the colored troops in front, as they were the raw soldiers. General Meade objected. General Grant supported Meade's objection; but now, with the simple, manly honesty that marks all his conduct, he declares that he believes he was mistaken, and that if General Burnside's plan had been adopted success would have been secured. The truth is, that General Burnside knew his own corps better than any other commander could know it; he had made the most careful dispositions; he had faithfully drilled his men to the service; he had their heart and had a mutual faith in themselves and in the work. At the very last moment the whole plan was deranged. Confusion was invited and came. There was a sharp cry of disappointment. Dejection followed disaster; and the fame of a gallant soldier and noble man was obscured. We sincerely congratulate him, and the country that the cloud is entirely scattered. And we shall all be the gainers if hereafter we do not hasten to demolish the sacrifice of a reputation for every reverse that we may encounter.

NEW PARTIES.

There is a present end of political parties in the country. There is a body of representatives, indeed, in Congress and in the State Legislatures, which stands in favor of human slavery, jeers at negroes, insults the Government, and virtually justifies the rebellion. But these individuals do not form a true political party. They are merely a faction; a band of adventurers; the roving, marauding remains of an army, holding together until they can advantageously ally themselves to some other organized and effective force. Single individuals like Long and Pendleton can not claim the name of party. Even a political body with which Griswold, Ganson, and Odell, for instance, do not act. The position of these latter gentlemen shows that the late Democratic party has no longer exists. Those will belong here after to those leaders who are most skillful in perceiving the principles upon which a party can be rallied.

Of the parties that existed when the war began the name "Democratic" alone remains. The Constitutional Union party survives only in Kenn Bell drinking success to the rebellion in bad whisky. The Republican party, as such, has secured its great object of limiting the extension of slavery. The necessities of the case, in a nation waging a civil war, divide us all into two bodies; those who support the Administration in its war policy, and those who do not. But this will not long be the test separate us. The party of the Administration is composed of men as different as the late Edward Everett, Gerrit Smith, Wendell Phillips, Greeley, Dutcher Weed, and Charles Sumner, who were respectively leaders of the Bell-Everett, the Breckinridge, the Douglas parties, and both wings of the Republican party, before the war. We are at the end of parties. Upon what grounds are they to be reconstructed?

There are various speculations upon this point, but they all seem to us to be premature. Parties in a free government divide upon the policy of administration. But until the administration of the Government is secure, it is too early to discuss policies. There may be differences as to the means of securing the authority of the Government. That is to say, the friends of the war may differ as to how it may be made most effective. But that is not a division into political parties.

Nor is it easy to infer from the previous history of the country what the division will be. The political struggle of this country from the beginning has been between the southern policy and the essential principles of the Government. But now that the latter have triumphed absolutely, and have destroyed the foundation of the former, the latter can be entirely new issues. These are likely to arise, in the first place, from the peculiar structure of our Government; and, in the next place, from the modifications necessary to carry it on. The relative rights and powers of the States and the nation, and the fundamental question of protection and free-trade, are the probable grounds of future party division.

The Evening Post, one of the oldest old-fashioned Democratic organs in the country, is of opinion that if the proposition of universal free-trade as the permanent national policy had been made to the rebel agents in Hampton Roads, it would have seriously tempted Mr. Hunter, an old free-trader. But however probable it may be that this question may hereafter divide the country politically, it would certainly have been an extraordinary suggestion from the President to the rebels. Nobody knows better than the Post that there is the utmost radical difference upon that very point among loyal men, and all that the President could have said would be no more than an expression of the probability that there would be a large free-trade party hereafter. But whether free-trade would be adopted as a permanent national policy the President could no more tell than Mr. Hunter. If he had chosen to indulge in political speculation of that kind the President might have added, that, in his opinion also, the doctrine of supreme State sovereignty would be effectually exploded. But such topics would hardly have been timely or judicious. What the President could officially do, was one thing. What Mr. Lincoln supposed he could officially decision upon a vital point of difference might be, was quite another.

In the present situation of the country there are no grounds upon which to construct great parties; but there was never a more favorable moment for the discussion of the causes which have brought us to this condition, that we may not only win victories but secure their fruits. The great fruit will be the establishment of the Government upon its original principles. When that is accomplished, parties will naturally arise.

THROWING IN PITCH.

General Grant has extended his lines before Petersburg toward the Southside Railroad, and General Sherman has seized a point which destroys the railroad communication of Richmond with the Southwest. Another piece of advance is like Napoleon's in his Austerlitz campaign. It shows no rashness, no confidence in chance; but is rapid and resistless. Every movement he makes writes his name more deeply in history as a truly great soldier.

Simultaneously with his success, simultaneously with the most deadly blow at the vitals of the rebellion, a shrill cry of rage bursts from its lips. At about the moment when Sherman's victorious columns occupied Bluffton, in their march of deliverance of the Southern people from the fierce despotism at Richmond, the leaders of the rebellion were in Hampton Roads, ranguing the people, declaring that the vile Yankees had insulted them beyond endurance, and that they must fight to the last gasp, or see their country destroyed, their homes ruined, and their family peace violated.

The wild fury of the speeches of the rebel chiefs is the natural downward-rushing impetuous spite and eagerness of the newspapers—show how profound is the conviction that only a convulsive energy can save the rebellion. The rebel chiefs see that they are the only hope of living; the rebel lines are shrinking before our steady advance. We occupy the rebel cities; we calmly invite the people to renounce their resistance to a Government which they confess has never injured them, or to suffer the consequences of refusal. Every where the national authority asserts itself. Every where the rebel power succumbs; and its leaders, foreseeing their doom, raise a yell of frenzy to stimulate despair. General Lee is reported to have said that all was well for the rebels if they would not yield to causeless despondency and foolish despair. General Lee is not a wise man, but he might have asked himself the reason of the general despondency around him.

A few years ago the people of his section were told that they had a right to break the Union; that if it were disputed they had merely to show their swords, and they could march out over the prostrate necks of the cuitiff tinkers called Yankees, and all the world would be moved. They would fight the battle at home if any were to be fought; that Europe would hasten to acknowledge their independence; that treat with the new nation; that cotton would coerce the world to the whims of "the South;" and that every gallant and chivalric Southron would have the satisfaction of shouldering the rifles which makes sunshine on earth, and "the South" graciously condescending to be the foremost nation of the globe.

Four years have passed, and these people see exactly what we see, what the world sees, and what General Lee sees. And thereupon that Captain says, if they only would agree to be despondency will be cured. "My dear Sir, why are you in the stocks?" asked a sympathetic friend of the unfortunate incumbent. "For stealing eggs, sir," was the reply. "Indeed! they can't put you in the stocks for stealing eggs," said the cheerful friend. "Can't they? Well, they have got it," dolefully answered the victim. If you only would not yield to despondency, says General Lee. How can we help it? his fellow-rebels might justly retort. If you only couldn't stretch the soles of your feet, as Procrustes might say to a martyr at the stake. Will you then please to remove the fire? would be a very natural response. General Lee can remove the despondency in one way only. Not by wondering at it, and expostulating with it, but by winning victories.

The loud cries and fierce execrations of the rebel orators and editors tell the people of the Southern States nothing new. Those people have always known that the war was waged by the rebel chiefs for separation and by the Government of the United States for the restoration of its authority over the rebel States. They of its authority over the rebel States. They know that before Stephens and Hunter went to Hampton Roads. They knew it after they returned. But they knew it no more distinctly. The very papers which now shout at the "extravagant insolence" of the Yankees in proposing union under the Constitution and laws of Congress, are the same papers which have always derided and affected to despise the Yankees as brutes and cowards. Of course, therefore, they will not submit very readily. There is no new form of invective against the Union which the rebel leaders can use. The old styles have become stale. And what malignant falsehood and foolish calumny could not do in the first four years of the war, they are not likely to effect when the spirit of the rebellion is broken by the terrible tenacity and increasing skill of the nation.

JUDAH P. BENJAMIN.

In his speech at the Richmond meeting to fire the rebel heart Mr. JUDAH P. BENJAMIN, of Louisiana, the rebel Secretary of State, strongly urged the policy of arming the slaves. When our soldiers in the trenches said he, are crying out for help, shall we care whether the aid we send is black or white? "There are in the South," he said, "six hundred and eighty thousand able-bodied men of fighting age, and capable of being made fighting men. Let us say to every negro who wants to go into the ranks, Go and fight, and you are free. Don't press them, for that will make them run away, and they will be found fighting against us instead of for us." Without the adoption of some decisive, energetic, full-way measure like this there was danger, very great danger.

BENJAMIN is DAVIS's confidential man. These are DAVIS's views. And the rebel Senate has almost unanimously refused to adopt this decisive and full-way measure. The chivalry find the alternative too bitter. To be saved by our own slaves from our Confederacy, of which Mr. STEPHENS declared that slavery was the chief cornerstone, upon abolition! To owe our independence, which is to be so gloriously achieved by every Southern gentleman shooting a few dozen Yankee vermin, to "niggers!" NO, Mr. BENJAMIN. It would be to this feast that the chivalry were invited to sit down, and they quite unanimously decline the invitation.

Let JUDAH BENJAMIN look at it. You have always insisted that negroes were meant for slavery. It was resisting the divine order to oppose it. It was flying in the face of Providence. It was blasphemous. The negroes are good for nothing else. They are an inferior race. They require guardianship. They must be forced to work. They are lazy, idle vagabonds. They ought to own labor and the laborer. The true order of society is that which rests upon a servile class. The negro is really thankful for slavery. Have we not all of us an old black mammy?

This is what you and the other false Americans who lead this rebellion have always been instilling into the Southern mind. The incessant reiteration of this frantic nonsense to a population kept purposely ignorant and degraded has produced in their minds a firm conviction that it is truth. All your efforts, and those of your whole political school, have been directed for a generation to proving that slavery, and slavery alone, was the only safe condition for the negroes, even while you were at profound peace, and had the power of the United States Government on its side.

Who is it, then, you hope to fool? Is it the whites you have so treacherously deluded or the blacks you have so infamously wronged? Are the whites to be for a moment all they have been sedulously taught and unlearn in a day the conviction of a life? Or are the blacks to forget a year's wrongs all they have suffered at your hands? Do you think that a class which is able to be stimulated by the hope of freedom into fighting for you has not been able to comprehend that it is a fraud? Do you think these slaves have not watched, and waited, and scored incredibly upon their souls what they could not speak and could not write? Do you think that if you sincerely suppose they will trust your word, a life-long oppressor of their race avenging upon them the medieval torture of your own broken vow when they hear that your promise of freedom is extorted only by the direst fear? Do you imagine they think you would hesitate to order them to their graves if the need arose, and their children to the auction block, the moment you felt sure of the safety of your own neck?

Or is it the whites who are to believe that all your treachery which ordered them into rebellion was false? If the negro is only fit for slavery, why promise him freedom? If God meant him to be a slave, is it his own wish, if he happy in it, why disturb him, why not promise him that God's order and his own choice shall be accepted? If, as STEPHENS said, you went out of the old Union to form a new one upon slavery, what do you mean by abolition? These are questions that will be asked, that ask themselves, and which you can not answer.

JUDAH BENJAMIN knows that the slaves understand this contest as well as he. JUDAH BENJAMIN knows that two hundred thousand armed slaves would be presently masters of "the Confederacy." Every rebel thinks of it and shudders. It is the most terrible alternative he could present. His promise of freedom as a boon shows that he is conscious that slavery is a wrong. And it has always been so since he has defended it. And he knew it before, as he knows it now. But if a wrong, are the slaves alone unconscious of it? And when they are summoned to arms upon BENJAMIN's plain confession that he and his class without their aid are helpless to avert the fate which gives the negro freedom, is the negro likely to be ignorant of his power?

They are not a childish people. They are patient, mild, and long broken by bondage. But they have been carefully kept dulled and degraded, and the probabilities of the case are to be judged by prejudiced and ignorant, not by intelligent minds. It is too late, JUDAH BENJAMIN! There was a moment in the war when you might have tried it. But a succession of despair it is hopeless. Your little speech is one of the most significant in our history. It contains the confession of supreme political folly. It slaps in the face all the boasted "statesmanship" of your section for half a century.

GOOD MANNERS IN NEWSPAPERS.

MR. RICE, of Massachusetts, lately called attention in the House to an article in a newspaper espousing his honesty as a legislator, and followed by caustic remarks upon another paper to be read, which contained an implied aspersion upon the honesty of the first. Thereupon MR. LAWRENCE, of Kansas, proposed to forbid the first paper to have any reporter in the House, but withdrew the suggestion at the request of MR. RICE, saying, however, that he should have vended to others from the dogmas of the newspapers of New York they were attacked in a foul manner by the newspaper scribblers.

There is, indeed, no more difficult task to be, a comprehensive discussion of all public questions, and a strict criticism of all public men in the great newspapers. The New York Independent, for instance, is a power to-day. But we do understand him to complain of that personal malevolence and critical asperity which too often characterize our political discussions and correspondence. This disposition has run riot since the war began. It has, indeed, gone so far that the press of this country has seriously impaired the character both for veracity and intelligence. From the beginning of the war, when one leading journal, friendly to the Administration, daily maintained that the Secretary of State was a traitor, down to the time when another of the same class sneered at MR. STEVENS as a superannuated old fogy whose whole week in a body to the House to proved with the counting of the electoral votes.

In the House, a resolution was adopted requesting information from the Executive relative to the recent Peace Commission. A joint resolution appropriating $1000 to procure a marble bust of the late Chief Justice was passed the House. The Senate, having arrived at one, the Presidential vote was proved. The whole number of electoral votes was 233: for Abraham Lincoln for President, and Andrew Johnson for Vice President, 212; for George B. McClellan and George H. Pendleton, 21.

February 9.

In the Senate, a bill was passed to take one degree of latitude from Utah and add the same to the State of Nevada. A bill was passed to build a bridge across the Mississippi river. A bill was passed to reimburse Missouri for expenses incurred in calling out the militia.

In the House, the report of the Committee of Conference on the bill to establish a bureau for freedmen was concurred in.

February 10.

In the Senate, the President's communication to the House on the Peace Conference was read and ordered to be printed.

In the House, the amendments to the Internal Revenue bill making whisky free had was defeated by a large majority. The President's communication on the Peace Conference was read.

February 11.

In the Senate, Lieutenant-General Grant made his appearance and received the courtesies of members. The Appropriation bill was passed by unanimous consent. An act for the salaries of the Assistant Secretaries of Departments to $3500 per year, and the Commissioner to $6000, for the extension of the Congressional Library.

In the House, MR. COX read an article in the Evening Post, charging him with interested motives in voting against the repeal of the duty on coal. General GRANT appeared on the floor, and the members paid their respects.

February 13.

In the Senate, a bill to establish a steamship line between San Francisco and China was passed. The House resolution returning the paper duty was passed, with an amendment making the duty ten per cent. The amendment of 2 per cent.

In the House, a resolution was adopted appropriating $25,000 for a naval picture by MR. POWELL. The House then took up the abolition of the Seven Hill. Amendments were agreed to exempting Bibles and Testaments, or volumes composed in part of the text of either, and prayer-books from any duty or tax. School books, and all books printed exclusively for Sunday schools, were also exempted from duty or tax.

February 14.

In the Senate, a resolution was adopted calling upon the President for a report of the Court of Inquiry on the sale of part of the cotton of the Petersburg mine.

In the House, the Senate bill, giving lands to Wisconsin to aid in the construction of railroads, was rejected by the House. The Amendatory Internal Revenue bill was then discussed, and the taxes on distilled spirits were amended so as to provisions in relation to tobacco manufactured or sold, and to the issuing of stamps to wholesale dealers, not otherwise herein provided for, that no gilt twists be bridges to be built over the Ohio at Cincinnati and Louisville were passed.

NEWS ITEMS.

The remains of the gallant Lieutenant B. H. Porter, United States Navy, who was killed while leading his men at the assault on Fort Fisher, were interred on Tuesday the 7th, at Skaneateles, with military honors. The Syracuse Citizens' Corps (Company A), Fifty-first Regiment, attended the funeral.

The gift of fifty-one thousand dollars in Government bonds to Vice-Admiral Farragut by the citizens of New York has had a second in the transmission to him of the letter of presentation, inclosed in "a beautiful blue morocco case, lined with white and red satin, resembling the royal colors."

Pascagoula has been evacuated by our troops.

The United States Army Laboratory located at Asteris was consumed by fire on the 16th instant. Loss about $50,000.

The rebel General John H. Winder died at Florence, South Carolina, on the 6th instant. Winder was known only too well by our prisoners.

It is said that the President's son, Mr. Robert Lincoln, intends entering the Army soon as an aid on the staff of Lieutenant-General Grant.

It is stated on good authority that the Calcutta cyclone cost sixty thousand lives. It is known, for example, that before the storm were struck George Island there were 8500 persons on it. When it had passed only 1200 remained, and this is only one of the many places swept. It is, however, the opinion of patagonia that we may settle that the storm were may one day sweep the Sunderlands, in which case the loss of life would probably be without a parallel, except in the two which may have been sustained when the Rum of Dublin, then a flourishing province, dropped one night into the sea.

General Canby's Peninsula campaign, both of which were sound at the capture of Fort Fisher, are still at Fortress Monroe, at the Quinnipiac Hotel, and the latest accounts were very encouraging. General Pemperton's wound was a very severe one, and it will be some time before he can recover, but he is doing well under the circumstances.

Colonel Mulford landed a cargo of a thousand of our exchanged prisoners at Annapolis on the 8th. "The best conditioned lot of our poor boys," said he, "we ever delivered to them. Indeed I could walk." He endeavored to bring away from Varina more of our sick and wounded prisoners, but the ice at the river banks made it impossible to ship them. The boats could not be forced up to the dock.

Rear-Admiral JOHN A. DAHLGREN, of Washington, died on the morning of the 14th, at the Metropolitan Hotel in Washington, in the 65th year of his age. He had been suffering from slight indisposition for two weeks. On the morning of the 14th, after an unusually refreshing sleep, he was seized with paralysis as he was about to rise. From that time until his decease he was insensible. He was visited by the President and numerous friends in his last illness.

Brigadier-General Grierson, the great raider, was, on the 13th, at the request of Lieutenant-General Grant, promoted to be Major-General by brevet.

John Van Buren died at Lake Ronkonkoma and spy, was on the 14th condemned to be hung on the 18th, by order of General Dix.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

PICKED UP THAT HABLEM.—The oldest lunatic on record —Time out of mind!

A DEFINITION OF HUMBUG.—A woman was being examined as a witness, when, to a question put by the lawyer, Clarkson, she replied, "Don't think to humbug me, Sir, you can't do that, Recorder said, "I object to the question directly, woman, or I will commit you." "Ay," said Clarkson, "that will be a new way of getting rid of humbug!" "Why," replied the woman, "if I was to tell you, Mr. Clarkson, that the Recorder was a gentleman, that would be humbugging you and the court too."

THE SWEETEST THING IN BONNETS.—A Lady's Lips.

FACTS NEVER TO BE LOST SIGHT OF.—That wide-awake people always have their eyes open; and that if you close them you don't keep your eyes open, they'll open them for you.

WOODEN OF POETRY.—An old gentleman of the name of Tripe, finding a young lady's glove at a masquerade ball, presented it to her with the following words:

"If you find a glove you look for in the dark
Your glove is love, which I devote to thee."

To which the lady returned the following answer:

"If you find a Tripe you take the latter P,
Your Tripe is ego, and that won't do for me."

THE WORST WINTER FUR.—Chinchilli.

A SHARP LAD.—A boy from the country was recently taught his first lesson in morality. One evening after having been called up into the drawing-room, he came down with a blushing face, and whispered to his father, "What's the matter?" cried the cook. "Why," said he, "there are twelve on 'em in there, and they've just stuff the candle, and they had to ring for I to do it."

A PULPIT JOKE.—At a church in Scotland, where there was a popular call, two candidates offered to preach, of the name of Adam and Eve. The congregation met in the morning, and took for his text, "Adam, where art thou?" In the afternoon the crowd discovered that the congregation were much edified. In the evening MR. Adam preached, and took for his text, "Eve, where art thou?" The impromptu and his sermon gained him the situation.

A COCKNEY'S EPITAPH.

Think! "Pears for the hair and for the face!" my brother,
A nurse takes you from one, an 'earse to t'other.

THE POWER OF LOVE.—Andrew Jackson was once making a tongue speech in the U. S. Senate, in a small Whig, but he was combating Amos Kendall, who sat behind him, and whom he did not like. A little Latin, General," said he, "will be content without it." Jackson instantly thought upon the Latin motto of the State of Virginia, and turning over up his speech by exclaiming, "Et pluribus unum—she can not—she will not—she shall not—unum is power." The cheers tremendous, and the shouts could be heard for many miles.

FORECASTS.

The day after to-morrow will be fine if not otherwise, and the state of the weather will depend on the two following days.

The whole of next week will very considerably, unless there be a continuous run of weather of one character.

The part of the week after that week will be fine. The next ten days, it must be understood that he will rise and set at 4 A.M. and 8 P.M. daily, and therefore no doubt will be felt about him.

If it does not we shall be pretty certain to have wind; if not, it will be more or less calm—perhaps both more or less, or even less.

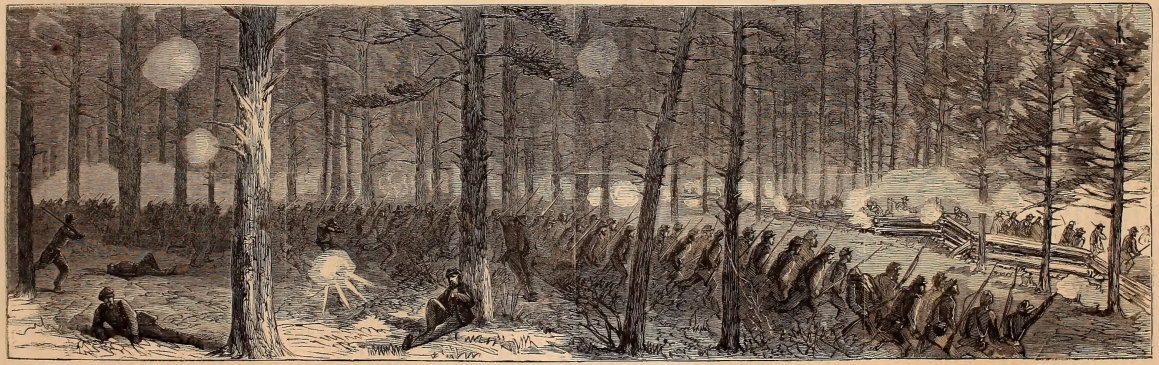
Should we have any rain it is more than probable that it will be wet, and should it be fine we shall very likely look for a thaw sooner or later.

The state of the weather for the first half of the year will be mainly dependent on the sort of weather we have in the next six months.

TO THEIR LOVERS.—The most delicate method of giving a lady a key to your feelings is to send her a lock of your hair.

THE DOCTOR AND HIS PATIENTS.—A certain eminent physician, being invited to a dinner-party, arrived at the house of his host at an unusually early hour than had been agreed upon as the dinner-hour. He accordingly strolled out of doors and commenced a leisurely pace which was hard by. When dinner was announced the doctor was absent, and an inquiry was made as to where he was. "Oh," said the servants, who had seen him in the church-yard, "he is paying a visit to some of his old patients."

THERE are two points on which the generality of Scotchmen are dull as they are sharp in all other respects. They labor under a delusion with regard to Sunday, which they call the Sabbath, and entertain an insane objection to instrumental church music, whence they name an organ "a kist fu' of whistles."



Peace makes plenty, plenty makes pride, pride breeds quarrel, and quarrel brings war; war brings spoil, and spoil poverty, poverty patience, and patience peace.

THE GREAT FIRE IN PHILADELPHIA—CORNER OF WASHINGTON AND NINTH STREETS.—[SKETCHED BY J. L. GILES.]

THE RECENT CONFLAGRATION IN PHILADELPHIA.

On the 8th instant there occurred the most terrible conflagration that has taken place in Philadelphia since the great fire of 1850. The fire originated about half past two A.M., in Washington Street, near Ninth, where there was an open lot on which BLACKBURN & Co. had between two and three thousand barrels of petroleum stored on account of various owners. The flames starting here spread almost with the rapidity of explosion through the yard. Says the Philadelphia Bulletin:

"The blazing oil that escaped from the burning barrels poured over into Ninth Street and down to Federal, filling the entire street with a lake of fire, and igniting the houses upon both sides of Ninth Street for two squares, and carrying devastation into Washington, Ellsworth, and Federal streets, both above and below Ninth Street.

"An eye-witness, who was upon the spot when the oil poured out into the street, describes the fierce body of flame so resembling a screw in its progress. It first whirled up Nisin Street, and then the fiery torrent rushed down the street for a distance of two squares, and then back again at the expense of the wind, destroying all living things that came in its way, burning dwellings and their contents as though they were as much straw, and even splitting into fragments the paving-stones as the stream with the intense heat. Fully five squares of houses, had they been placed in a row, were on fire at once. And the scene was one to make the stoutest heart quail.

"People sprang from their dwellings in terror, with no covering but their night-clothes; parents seeking for their children, and children filled the street looking for their parents. The horrid torment, were all dreadful enough, but there were still more terrible scenes witnessed. Men, women and children were literally roasted alive in the streets."

It is thought that eight persons were burned to death. One of the most thrilling incidents connected with the fire was the daring attempt made by a Mr. Fetzsworm, fireman, to rescue a child from her house, which was encircled by the flames. It is thus described by the Philadelphia Press:

"The fireman, all shaking and seething, was going down the street, and the house, from which eleven persons had been rescued but a moment before, was licked up by the red, fiery tongues of the demon of Destruction. At this time the brave fireman was hearing in his strong arms the body, it is supposed, of Mrs. Wurz or one of her daughters. His companions were driven back by the approach of the burning element—the increasing heat and stifling odors. Almost at the same moment that Fetzsworm got burst through the rear part of the house, and, flowing through the rooms, all chance of escape was gone. The brave fireman endeavored to fight his way out, still holding the woman in his arms. He reached the front door step; it was a moment of horror; he leaped from the step, driven by the force of burning oil through the rooms, but the flames closed around him; a groan and a shriek escaped the lips of the fireman, and both fell down. His companions endeavored to rescue both, but it was impossible. Their crisped remains were found but a few feet distant from each other."

The loss from the fire is estimated at half a million. The victims of this fire, which fell to the poorest of the sufferers, will probably be made up to them by charitable citizens.

THE COLONEL'S VALENTINE.

I.

"I NEVER was guilty of such a thing in my life," said the Colonel, calmly.

"Never sent a valentine?"

"Never."

"Nor received one?"

"No."

"Benighted ignorance! Here is a man to whom the most pleasing emotions are unknown; whose heart has never been wrung by the sight of its fashionable parcel with a barbed shaft, or softened by a delicious couplet wrapped in roses! I'll tell my Cousin Mary. Miss Arundel, here is a full-grown man who never sent or received a valentine."

Now if any one had been attentively observing him they might have detected a slight change in the indolent composure of the Colonel's handsome features. His negligent posture became the least bit more upright, and a glance from under half-closed eyelids toward the lady addressed as Miss Arundel might have aroused in that same attentive observer some little of the interest of speculation. But not if the attentive observer had been at hand; which he wasn't.

Colonel Hugh Carton had been leaning carelessly over the back of a couch on which lounged his friend and inquisitor, Francis Graham, the boyish son of his host, Carton's present host. And if Colonel Carton had been asked some ten days ago what he thought about country visits in general he would probably have answered, with a shrug, "Bore!" His opinion had undergone modification by this time, because the Graham Grahams were singularly felicitous in the party of guests they contrived to draw together; perhaps ten days of such glorious society are rarely fall to the lot of the country's infancy had something to do with the complacent state of his mind. At any rate, when young Graham appealed to Miss Arundel there was in Colonel Carton's momentary emotion a small stir of regret that this was the last evening of his stay.

The young lady was occupied with one of those never-ending resources, the photographic albums, and she did not look up to answer her cousin's mock. It did not possibly matter to her about Colonel Carton and his valentines.

"What a time you are making, Frank!" she said, "and you drove the music."

"Music!" echoed Frank. "A dissipated entreaty to drink this cup of sparkling wine." You know I ought not to listen to that, Mary. And it makes my flesh creep, and turns you all into waternymph-like gnomes. No. Whose caricature have you got there?"

"I have got Titians as Margaret," replied Miss Arundel, quite truthful to her book.

"Somebody dressed up to resemble her, you mean?" said Mr. Frank.

He made one or two more efforts to draw his cousin into what he called conversation, failed, gave it up, hid a yawn with some difficulty, and sauntered away. Those two were hopelessly given to the one as bad as the other. And suddenly something seemed to occur to Mr. Frank, for he exclaimed, "By George!" and looked back; but the relative positions were just as he had left them.

It might have been supposed that the Colonel, thus left free, would naturally join the young lady in her examination of Titians as Margaret; but he did not. He only altered his position by leaning against a dark background of curtain, so as to be able to take in the whole room, with all its arrangements, at a glance. Certainly his business was a woman of tact. The general fault is these country-house assemblages was, he considered, that the guests were left too much en masse—too gregarious. Now, here and there, in Mrs. Graham's drawing-room, small knots were dotted about, admirably placed, and admitting of games for two only, apart from the rest, without being positively isolated: brakes at which delightful little flirtations could and did go on with the most comfortable freedom from disturbance. Some one or two of these caught the Colonel's eye in its glance round the room, and he smiled to himself slightly. It is to be feared that he had a disposition to be cynical about them. He never flirted himself; it was an amusement that had no charm for him; but he thought this a very clever plan for parceling off sundry pairs out of the mass of guests, and making them amuse themselves—and others who chose to look on. Then his eyes came back to Miss Arundel over her book. They rested there with a strange expression for a moment, and then dropped. Other people, perhaps, would have seen little beauty in the face, except the beauty inseparable—in a degree at least—from youth. But Colonel Carton did not see as other people did. He was up in the clouds about Mary Arundel, in fact, and had been all the time in his life. All that was most exalted, all that he would have been skeptical about a fortnight ago, tinted his thoughts of her. He threw his light of stars about her till it dazzled him. He fancied—see how visionary the mystical man grows when he is touched!—he fancied that, little as he sought her, they were yet together in perpetual, half-conscious thought of each other, and communion before God's judgment. But his visit was over, and could not be prolonged. He did not yet know whether he meant to go away having kept silence, or not.

Perhaps this uncertainty was a charm in itself; he could not tell. By-and-by, when the music-fit brought Frank back, he left his leaning posture and approached Mary's table.

"It is a pity that pleasant things should come to an end," said he, in a voice rather less than usual.

From any one else such a commencement as this by an abstract proposition, might have made her laugh; but Colonel Carton was not one to put into a habit of speaking to her out of his half-finished reveries; and she was used to it.

"I don't know," responded Mary. "They say that pleasure itself would cease to be pleasant if it had no end."

The Colonel meditated.

"That applies to the present only; I mean to date here-to-morrow. You go also, I think?"

"Yes, I must be at home for my sister's wedding. It is fixed for the fourteenth."

The Colonel gave a shade sharper as he looked down upon the face that was never raised to his.

"If I thought—" he began, slowly.

He never finished. The sense of his restless friend broke in upon him, and he stopped. He never did say thing in a hurry.

"Valentine's Day," said Frank, catching his cousin's speech, and innocently unconscious that he could have been spared, "is a very proper day too. Now, Mary, confess; haven't you a weakness for valentines?"

"No, Frank."

"Carton," said Frank, solemnly, "she is afraid of you and won't own it. Valentine's Day has never passed yet without bringing her a cargo of what she affects to despise."

Mary laughed.

"And very amusing it is, especially when I get an original lyric from Francis Graham. You know, Frank—"

Uh—ut! Don't add libel to your other crimes. Carton, when we were pinafores Mary promised to be faithful to me, and would have kept my part and waited for her—I mean, allowed me to wait for me," said Frank, twinkling his eye; "but that was before I is. I am ashamed of my own condemns valentines, and my poor annual offering is rejected!"

Mary answered quickly, a little displeased:

"Frank, you carry your nonsense too far. Of course, I am very fond of valentines, and you can send me as many as you like. Only, as I have added, trying to speak lightly; "all done up in a beautiful lace envelope, with 'To my Valentine,' illuminated outside."

Mary stopped. There was a movement in the room which she understood, and she rose, not allowing Frank time to get away.

"I shall remember," said the Colonel, turning to her, but then he added, "I am afraid I shall not see you to-morrow; I start early. Good-night, and good-by."

He might have held her hand a little longer than was usual or necessary; perhaps he did.

But Mary went through the other "Good-nights" with perfect calmness, and was sufficiently interested in her notice that her eyes were very bright and her cheeks had more pink in them than usual. And the Colonel's valet, who had been sent to the smoking-room, after his habit; but he did not stay there long, and he was very silent. In the early morning Francis Graham volunteered to accompany his friend for a mile or two. I dare say the Colonel could have dispensed with the courtesy; but he said nay and accepted it.

As he rode away Colonel Carton turned his head, and looked back by up along the range of windows which still had their blinds closed. It is just possible that this wistful backward look was seen, but that is Mary's business, not ours.

II.

COLONEL CARTON was in town; a lonely, meditative man. He had spent a whole dull month in London. He had squandered a certain probable lying information, respecting the operas for the forthcoming season; he had read political articles till he was ashamed of himself, and had walked up and down place to place aimlessly, with a weight on his mind, and a vague belief that there was a flaw somewhere in the government of the universe, but where it was he could not tell. For when Colonel Carton rode away from the Graham's "place in the country," I don't think he ever contemplated the possibility that this thing which had happened to him would happen. The Colonel had never met a sensation in his life before; he sent one then. It was not a string of mild rhymes of his own putting together; nor a purchased and printed piece of inane sweetness. It is true that he, who did nothing by halves, bethought him of the lace envelope which Mary had spoken of. She was jesting, of course; but she should have one. I don't know how many respectable dealers in such fancy goods hated the Colonel for his hardness to please; and I should be afraid to chronicle the price at which he finally secured a single envelope of the most delicate elaboration of design and finish. And on the outside of this he wrote gravely, "To my Valentine." There might have been a comical sort of dismay in his face as he wrote it, and perhaps he was not ashamed of it; he was too much in earnest. Whatever it looked like to others, it meant for him, "To my wife—if she will have me."

He could not have borne, of course, that indifferent eyes should see that dainty envelope and know it for his. He meant to see it—that is, no one but Mary. And then he had written his letter, and the light of stars got into it and filled it. He came down out of the clouds to infer; solemnly to earnest. The tender words which made their escape, somehow, from his unaccustomed pen, gave him so odd a sensation when he saw them that he was fain to lay his hand over the page and hide them from his own eyes as he went on.

What a fool he was!

This he would have said now; for this valentine, which had left his hands into an almost sacred thing, never was answered.

Colonel Carton was not a conceited man; but he had a certain reasonable amount of pride. When this girl seen in him that she should not only mock him with the affectation of interest, but absolutely receive his proposal with an insulting silence?

He might not be worthy of her, perhaps; but he was her equal in all the forms; and, at any rate, an honest man's offer of his heart and home and faithful devotion is at least worth a reply. The Colonel's pale face went with a little at these times when he was turning this over in his mind; indeed it might be difficult to say when he was not turning it over in some indirect fashion. He would not have told the episode to his dearest friend—by-the-way, I doubt whether he had a dearest friend; if he had, that same friend kept strangely aloof from him now. The Colonel had few likings; his heart would have been all his wife's, if—

Well, it was of no use to think any more about it. And, having come to that conclusion, the Colonel would think about it again again, and go over all the details of that visit which had been so precious to him.

A short time after, Mary Arundel's sister married Mr. Temple, a Member of Congress. Mary was living a grand life, he thought. If he had only known!

III.

"LET me come in a bit, Carton. What an awful time it is here in town, to be sure!"

"Just two years," replied the Colonel, thoughtfully. "I hadn't this room then."

Frank Graham looked, and made a grimace at the superfluity of looking-glass which surrounded him.

"No: you may get a view of yourself in any position you like. I don't know why you were put here; one of the mysteries of domestic polity, I suppose."

The Colonel shivered slightly, as a blast of wind sounded round the house and finished up with a dismal moan at the window.

"The fire is comfortable," he said. "If I recollect rightly, it's different weather than that we had this time two years. Many people here, Frank?"

"Well—yes; pretty fair. You know most of them. Mr. Temples are here. And Mary Arundel is with them. Carton, don't be angry with a fellow; but, do you know, I used to fancy—"

There's just fifteen minutes to dress in," said the Colonel, with a hurried deliberation; "and I don't know that I can do it, no—"

"In pity's name don't! Go to take and book it,' eh? Well, I'll not hinder such a got-up as yours. By-by."

Colonel Carton gave exactly five out of the fifteen minutes remaining to meditation; which did him very little service. So he would have to meet her again. And he had tried to settle this question, and failed. After all, it did not depend entirely upon himself; it was as well, perhaps, to leave it to chance.

He was down in excellent time, notwithstanding the wasted five minutes; and it fell to his lot to take Miss Arundel down to dinner.

I don't suppose that a more taciturn couple ever descended a staircase together. The Colonel had reserved his conversation with Miss Arundel indeed, but with the most inimitable distance and gravity. No one, seeing them meet, would have suspected the existence of those past passages in their lives which once drew them so closely together. And the Colonel did not think it necessary to make conversation either. Beyond the barest civilities he said nothing, and seemed quite content that Mary's attention should be wholly engrossed by her other neighbor.

That night the Colonel played chess with Mrs. Temple at one of the convenient little tables before-mentioned. It was rather a silent game, so that they could not have made much progress toward intimacy by means of words; neither can I tell how it was that before he checkmated her the Colonel had been himself speaking to Mrs. Temple with his old peculiar mixture of frankness and reserve accorded only to his friends, while she listened to him, surprised to find that they had known and known each other from childhood instead of having met for the first time an hour or two ago. The psychologist might resolve it into a simple question of natural affinities; at any rate, whatever the cause, the result is certain, that these two sought each other out from the first night of their meeting as old friends might have done.

"My sister is going to sing," said Mrs. Temple, one evening, as the visitors were placed. "I'm afraid this will be a poor game, for I always listen to Mary. You have heard her?"

"No," the Colonel was not aware that Miss Arundel sang at all.

"Yet you must have met here once before, I think?"

"Yes."

"That is strange. Perhaps it was—ah, yes, I remember, singing was forbidden to her just then; she is never very strong. Do you play first?"

Colonel Carton propelled the king's pawn into its accustomed square, and appeared to watch his adversary's move with interest.

Miss Arundel is much quieter than she was two years ago," remembered that she was the life of all pleasure arrangements. If she is in delicate health that explains it."

"Awful thing," said Mrs. Temple, laughing. "She will tell you it's old age. Mary is odd."

The Colonel looked at her ladyship's blonde face and fair hair inquisitively. And he had at least five years younger than Mary, he thought. And move a knight with a finger on the piece he was about to move, he stopped. As a rule, he did not care for amateur singing; people in the constant habit of hearing first-rate professionals seldom do. But this was another thing, altogether different from the amateur singing of his experience. He kept his eyes on the board steadily, but Mary Temple saw that he was not thinking about the game.

"Suppose we give it up for a time?" said she.

He looked quickly, with a slight smile.

"I beg your pardon, Mrs. Temple, but unless you wish it; I move the bishop."

"Indeed I don't," replied Mary Temple, and utterly foreign to his usual tactics; but she said nothing, and the Colonel lost the game in a few moves.

"For the first time!" said she, triumphantly; "we will not begin again to-night."

Colonel Carton acquiesced. Mary was still at the piano, and had sung a Spanish air. When such assemblies as these get hold of a fine voice, there is very little mercy shown to its owner. By-and-by the Colonel got restless, and went up again to Mrs. Temple.

"You said your sister was not strong. Won't she be tired?"

"Yes," said Mrs. Temple; "I shall put a stop to it."

Perhaps she expected him to accompany her to the piano, but he did not; neither did he join the group of flatterers. She loaded the singer with thanks and flattery. And she left her seat when none each other; when they were, it was as though they had been alone in an iceberg, and never again could thaw into any degree of kindliness or warmth. Yet still the Colonel staid on. He had only come down for a few days, he knew, and was quite ready. He did not know how closely those keen eyes of young Graham's watched him, nor how perplexed the young man was with his behavior.

"They make love like crowned heads," said Frank: "that is, if it isn't all a sell; / never saw such stately politeness between lovers."

But there was no love-making in the case; nothing at all like it.

And one evening Carton determined with himself that he had staid too long already, and would positively take his departure the next morning. He was standing indolently in the doorway of the back drawing-room when he made this decision; and when he left it, to that center of retreats, he saw Mrs. Temple and her sister, two or three other young ladies, and Frank Graham, all in some animated discussion. And that, except Mary. Her face was turned toward the piano, and her profile, which was all he saw, struck him with its expression of weary listlessness. Suddenly Mary turned and looked at him—a strange look, averted hastily in a moment, for she had not known that he was there. Mary Arundel saw that look, and was shocked, nonsensical, every thing that's bad."

The Colonel felt a bitterness that the occasion did not seem to demand, replied,

"As mediums for inflicting pain and unwarrantable insult, I think them admirable, Frank."

Every one looked up at the Colonel as he said this. Even Frank began rashly, "Hallo, old fellow, I don't think—" and then stopped in knowing what to say. Mrs. Temple was the first to break the uneasy silence, which she did with an appointed indifference.

"Colonel Carton judges them harshly." I have had many a laugh over mine before I was married. I don't get any now. I remember the last but I had was on my wedding morning, and I never opened it."

"Never opened it!" repeated Frank. "What a shame!"

"No. It wasn't likely I could attend to such matters then. When I took off the outside cover, and saw what it was, I threw it with a lot of old shoes, and other rice-and-slop, into a corner, and for any thing I know to the contrary. It's odd I never had the curiosity to look for it: suppose we have a search now? Frank, you may fetch the desk, if it isn't too heavy for you."

No one spoke while Mrs. Temple unlocked the treasure-box, which her sister presented to her as a lady's use. No one noticed the tall figure behind the curtain, or saw how the lips compressed and white, the head bending lower and lower, and the long fingers pressing into each other as Mrs. Temple dived into the secret recesses of the desk. He saw it all now; all his blind stupidity, and what it had caused, flashed across him as Mrs. Temple held up the long-hidden envelope. Half a dozen of all hands were stretched out eagerly for it; one, larger than these, suddenly pressed somewhat heavily on her shoulder.

"Mrs. Temple, may I entreat of your goodness to restore to me that letter?"

"Colonel Carton—to you?"

"To me. And that valentine; the only one I ever did or ever shall send. Mrs. Temple, on my honor it contains nothing that could offend you in any way. Another time I will explain fully; now, to my regret and remorse concerning it, grant my request."

Mrs. Temple did not hesitate a moment. Something in this man's agitated manner appealed to her too strongly, and once again the Colonel held in his hand the luckless envelope at variance with date and finish, and looked down upon the address in his own writing, "To my Valentine."

"It strikes me that we are being selfish," said Mrs. Temple, shutting up the desk briskly. "Take it back, Frank, and, young ladies, follow me, if you please, into the drawing-room, where every body is wondering why there is no music."

The Colonel stepped forward out of his corner. Did Mary know? Did she understand all and forgive him?

"Not you," said the Colonel, when she rose to go with the rest; "not you quite yet. Surely my punishment has lasted long enough!"

They stood together on the hearth, and the Colonel held out the unhappy valentine above a tiny jet of flame.

"You know that it is your property," he said. "I never thought of your sister at all; never thought of any other Miss Arnstel than you. How was I to know you were not the eldest?"

"If it is mine give it to me, Colonel Carton."

"Presently. I asked you in it to be my wife, Mary; as one had a right to expect I should do. What could I think when I got no answer? Perhaps we have both misjudged each other?"

"Perhaps."

"Through this error? We have been dreadfully polite these few days," said the Colonel, with a comical fearfulness. "I couldn't have stood it any longer; I meant to go away to-morrow."

The Colonel paused. The light of stars began to shine about her again as he held out his hand.

"Mary, I would be very true and loving to you. Will you be my wife?"

Perhaps Mary was a little bit afraid of a scene just then, knowing that at any moment she might be summoned to the piano; and she was not wrong. Her answer, when she did answer in words, was another question:

"Will you give me my valentine at last and let me go?"

I think the Colonel was satisfied with it.

"THESE THREE."

No viceless angels by our side,
With wings, but women sweet and good;
"These Three," indeed, with us abide,
True types of womanhood.
Yea, I, in turn, have rendered a hand
To each one of the blessed three,
In one fair group I've seen them stand—
Faith, Hope, and Charity.

My Faith hath misty hair—and eyes,
You can not fix their changing hue,
But all the world within them lies,
And all the soul looks through.
Her voice doth make divinely sweet
Each song of sorrow which she sings,
And sudden wisdom fills replete
Her heavenly comforting.

My Hope is ruddy with the flush
Of morning joy, that keeps its place,
Though day has darkened, and the rush
Of rain on her face.
Her clear eyes look afar, as bent
On shining fixtures gathering in;
Naught seems too high for her intent,
Too hard for her to win.

My Love hath eyes as blue and clear
As clefts between the clouds of June,
A tender mouth whose smiles are near
To tears that gather soon.
Her best and loveliest she takes,
To light dark places—wastes of life
She sows with precious seed that makes
All richest blessings rife.

Faith, when my soul in darkness dwells,
Shall sing her song throughout the night,
For each new effort life compels
Hope's chop shall nerve with might;
Love shall divide each grief and pain,
Share every joy thus doubly given,
With each in turn life grows divine,
With all it tastes of heaven.

BARON CRUMP.

MRS. ORMSBY had only one fault, and that was exaggerated romance and sentiment—an amiable sort of fault, but it led her into some mistakes not pleasant to look upon. She, and indeed all her kind friendships and attachments at first sight which were not exactly prudent. Because the neighborhood turned its back upon Mrs. Smallcase and such hard things about her, Mrs. Ormsby made her her bosom friend, and was a year in finding out that the neighborhood was right after all. And when nobody else would hire Barbara Bridge in the capacity of cook, Mrs. Ormsby, taking the girl on "dear old thing," engaged her at high wages, and had her tipsy on her hands until she set the house on fire by putting a fluid lamp under her pillow instead of the kitchen key.

So in her girlhood had she, while very young and pretty, refused every offer sanctioned by her parents, and fallen in love instead with a young lawyer's clerk, with a pretty face and poor health, whom she met by stealth, in Peggy the housemaid's shawl and bonnet in the neighboring park, of evenings, and with whom she finally eloped one Sunday morning after church. Visions of a romantic reconciliation with her only parent doubtless filled her mind, but they were never realized. Her father only lived long enough to make his will, and then died of apoplexy, brought on by indignation at his daughter's disobedience.

So the honey-moon was married by tears and the want of bread and butter, which the newly-made pair were quite young enough to fancy and eat a good deal of. Six years after, when Mrs. Ormsby was but twenty-one and her husband twenty-five, all the romance was on Mrs. Ormsby's side; and her husband was dead. He left behind her a fair young widow, who wore rouge, frizzed her hair, and made no secret of liking porter.

However, the little woman never suspected half his falsehood; and when he drowned himself trying to sport on the waves at New Utrecht with the fat widow, who was one of a fashionable bathing-party, poor Mrs. Ormsby wished from the bottom of her heart that she was dead too, and prayed on her knees to be wretched forever. So she might have been in good earnest, for slow starvation is a trying thing, but that a grandmother-in-law died later, and left her in her will a fortune more than sufficient to make her comfortable for life. With this she established herself in a pretty house in Philadelphia, and devoted herself to her children—two boys of five and four, and a girl baby.

Upon her arrival, many people sought her rather more than they had been in the habit of doing while she struggled with poverty; and being, as we have said, romantic, of course Mrs. Ormsby was also disinterested and benevolent creatures in the world. Some single ladies are remarkably gifted in at every one or two, as far as to accept that they have passed their sixteenth birthday; and though Mrs. Ormsby had been married, and had a family, she had viewed life only through the medium of novels.

Therefore it almost broke her heart to refuse the offers of marriage which were made her every day in the first few years: by the portly Quaker, who wanted an affectionate companion, by tall Mr. B——, who had had three wives before, and by short Mr. C——, who desired to set up for himself in some mysterious business down town. She went all out in her self-denial, for Mr. Ormsby, a German hunter, with the smallest possible conscience ever doled out to mortal man, threatened to shoot himself if she did not say "Yes;" but long ere the constant to the memory of her fickle spouse, never thought of taking pity on him and marrying a second time.

So the years glided by from twenty-five to thirty, from thirty to thirty-five. Mrs. Ormsby's boys grew great fellows, taller than their mother, and Miss Ormsby was old enough to have half the tucks let out of her dresses, and to hint left the nursery some distance behind, but she was buxom and blooming still, and almost as charming as when, disguised in Peggy's bonnet and shawl, she went to meet by stealthily with the enamored lawyer's clerk in Franklin Square by moonlight.

One of poor Mrs. Ormsby's friends was Mrs. Finch, also a widow. Struggling along in their earlier life they had sympathized with each other, and though Mrs. Ormsby was now well to do she never forgot little Mrs. Finch, who was still keeping boarders in a house not far away, and whose trials and grievances were, of course, under the romantic legion. On the contrary, her romance found one very commendable vent in kindness to her old school-mate, and Mrs. Finch appreciated it highly. However, that lady was by no means sentimental. Single gentlemen who found their comfort there never meant to pay for bad nor attend to the wishes those dreams which used to instigate the scribbling of bad poetry when she was Rose Matilda Ruby; and this fact had occasioned constant offense of opinion between the friends, and had caused Mrs. Ormsby to say, that Mrs. Finch had made poor Rose Matilda's heart a thing of stone—at least upon the surface.

This was the much ill-used mistress of the boarding-house found it absolutely necessary to hint to her last boarder, the Baron Crump, that his apartment would be more acceptable than his society. A proceeding which Mrs. Ormsby denounced as heartless.

"But how is one to live?" asked Rose Matilda, with butter at the price it is, and eggs so much a dozen; and whoever else loses their appetites nowadays never do, my dear."

"How is he to live, poor destitute foreigner?" and Mrs. Ormsby's laced handkerchief went to her eyes.

"If I can get along with my family I'm sure he might with mine," said Mrs. Finch. "Ah! it is all very well, dear, for you to have property, but you don't know what I have to endure; and if I am stony-hearted I hope I'll be ashamed before long: one needs to be such a horse full of bowels."

"So you really will drive the poor Baron from the shelter of your roof?"

"If he can't pay his bills I must. Why don't he teach his music or his German to somebody?"

"He must be helped a little, I'm sure, to come to that. Don't you remember our reading 'The Heir of a Dukedom,' and crying over the trials of Leonard Lee before he sought out those haughty wretches, Lady Ruth and Lady Sophy?"

"Mercy no! I've forgotten all about 'em," replied Rose Matilda.

"I haven't," said her companion. "Oh no, I trust my heart will ever melt for the woes of suffering virtue! Rose Matilda, do you think the Baron would condescend to be a tutor in a family?"

"No doubt he would, my dear," said Mrs. Finch.

"If one only dared ask him. His people are so deficient in music and languages; but to make the offer and see the blood mount to his proud cheeks and his eye flash. Oh, Rose Matilda, it couldn't stand it!"

"What are you talking of, for goodness' sake?" interrupted little Mrs. Finch, with astonished eyes wide open.

"Of the Baron. I would engage him as a tutor for the boys, if I thought he would be willing to accept the offer."

"If he is willing to accept my beef and pudding I should think he might. You can ask him," replied the lady, shortly. "But, Maria Jane, let me give you one piece of advice—lock up your spoons, and don't fall in love with him, or I shouldn't be a barber!"

Jane Maria Ormsby wept: "I had yet to learn that Rose Matilda Finch could insult the unfortunate, or sneer the motives of one who has ever been her truest friend!" she said, with dramatic emphasis and a glance worthy of Mrs. Siddons, and sailed from the room, which she did not enter again for a little eternity of a fortnight. At the end of that time the Baron Crump was installed as tutor under the roof of Mrs. Ormsby's domicile. He came thither with two shirts and one pair of socks in a portmanteau, with Ollendorf under one arm and an accordion under the other; and so frightened the black girl who admitted him, by his long hair and fierce gestures, that she had hysterics in the kitchen for an hour afterward.

He was not a handsome man, being wondrously long and lank, with pale straw-colored hair, and fishy eyes, and he had a way of making his harsh gutteral language out-Germ harsher and more gutteral than it usually sounded. He looked, too, on the whole, any thing but aristocratic or noble, in any sense of the word. But romance had shed a lustre over him, and Mrs. Ormsby saw in the new tutor the hero of a novel—exiled, insulted, and cast upon her charity.

As Titania looked upon Bottom so looked the sentimental widow upon Baron Crump; and though she did not "feed him with apricots and dewberries," she took great pains that such substantial luxuries as ham and eggs should be set before him as he chose to signify his pleasure to partake. Truth to say, so did the romantic widow feast and lionize the new Baron during the time she cooked chicken in kalsomine that he was "fairly set up master."

Alas! alas! how shall we own the truth? Poor Mrs. Ormsby's romance constant to her husband's memory throughout her youth. The Quaker had not touched her heart; she never dreamed once of the spectral-looking bachelor Baron Crump; and then

HOME AGAIN!—THE STORY OF A LIFE IN REBEL PRISONS.

THE VALENTINES FOR NUMBER TWENTY.

I had not got my town head when I reached this great city; and Hermia help the poor country lad's brains when he comes into the din for the first time after making a long train journey! How over all the noise I seemed to hear the screaming of fifty locomotives, the ringing of a thousand bells, the rattle of a million carriages, and a dull roar like a thousand muffled drums beating at a hundred funerals—all at once. And how I crept away after I deposited my luggage at the address given me, and wandered for an hour in gloomy back streets far away from the bewildering roar—streets that seemed to lead in no place, and never have any one coming in or going out of them. I mention this to show I really was young and very, very green at that date of my life.

I came from the country to enter on what my stepfather called "the brilliant path of commerce," which, definitely speaking, was to occupy a clerk's stool in the counting-house of Hemp & Hall—great names cityward, as every one knows. "A grand opening" this path of commerce was called by many people; but I can not say I ever agreed with them. I took possession of the lodgings Smithers the headclerk had taken for me, and of my stool in the office next morning, and thus began my city life.

I fell ill, and Smithers sent me a doctor, and occasionally dropped in of an evening; but with this exception I spent day after day alone.

To while away the tedious hours I was driven to staring out of the window—for I was not always confined to bed, but principally on a sofa in my sitting-room, which, I ought here to mention, was on the second floor of the house.

Of the three houses directly opposite no kind Providence omitted my interest on the middle one. For an infirm old lady who never went out occupied the one to the right, and a tiresome old bachelor who was always out the one to the left; so what could I do all day but stare at the middle one?

I soon found out how many occupants this house had. I knew the hours of their going out, and the hours of their coming in; and if I did not guess accurately what they had for dinner, at least I knew the hour at which they ate it. I asked the servant what the name of the family was, and she stared at me as if I were "a blinder phenomenon" with a plurality of heads. Then I sent the willing slavey across the street, and she returned with the exciting news that No. 20 was on the hall door. But this helped me little; for on procuring last year's 'Directory' I found No. 20 marked "vacant;" so my interesting inquiries were suddenly checked.

There were four people living in this house, besides the servants—father, mother, and two girls I concluded at the daughters. Their drawing-room was a double room, just on a level with mine, but not so exactly opposite that I could not see the fire-place, my mark, it being December, the ladies were generally grouped. When the folding-doors stood open I had an excellent view, owing to the thorough light, and could see various pieces of furniture plainly. A piano, a couch, a work-frame, and flowers in the far-off drawing-room. I could see into the parlor too; yes, even to the corner of the paper which Paterfamilias read—and smoking, and I could see the spiral lady who poured out the tea.

It was all very well to allow the family to go without a surname, but I soon found it absolutely necessary to give the young ladies Christian names. Easy as the task may appear, I had some difficulty in selecting suitable ones. At last, in a moment of inspiration—I could scarcely call it any thing else—I bethought me of the "Midsummer Night's Dream" and its sweet heroines, and I at once decided my two friends should be Helena and Hermia. This was a grand idea. The taller, and I concluded the elder, should be Helena, and the pretty little creature should be Hermia. I had always looked on Hermia as a small woman.

I found it much more comfortable for myself when their names were allotted. Thus, when they came down to the drawing-room before dinner, and, as they often did, sat on low seats and read by the fire light, it was so much pleasanter to say, "Helena has on her blue dress," or, "Oh, dear me! Hermia has finished her book, and volume already," instead of "the tall one" or "the short one." Every day they went out to walk unless it were very wet, and I used to be in a fever of impatience until they came in again; and if rain came on about the hour I was quite miserable until they came home for fear of their being wet.

Thus days passed on until a few were only left before Christmas. My opposite neighbors were very busy all the week before Christmas. At first I wondered what the girls were about when for two mornings they never made their appearance in the drawing-room; and it was with a feeling of great joy I saw the pleasant old light dresses before dinner, and the books and seats by the fire as usual, until the father's knock and entrance brought them and me all going to the servitude. It was very stupid of me not to remember that Christmas bookkeeping had to be attended to, for I made myself uninterestingly unhappy with the fear that Helena and Hermia might be going away to spend Christmas, and that the mornings might be taken up packing in their own house.

At last I saw Hermia one morning in the drawing-room. She came in with a pile of papers, and going to the secretaire, took out some sheets of letter paper which she proceeded to cut into various fancy patterns.

"It is for ornament," I cried, joyfully; "then they are going to spend this week at home, for what would be the use of making ornamental paper if they were going away?"

Miss Hermia spoiled two or three sheets of paper before she succeeded in cutting out but a laughably ludicious way in which she burned her failures, and only went down stairs with her successes in her hand. At that very moment I was busy at my desk which would, I am sure, have been the very thing for her; and a hundred times at least during that day I wished I might have the pluck to offer it to her. Fancy the exquisite felicity of seeing her cut my paper! Even if it were to be dropped as small as non-sense into the grate or burning fiery furnace afterward, what matter? Gladly would I have followed the fragments, could I but have been satisfied that Hermia and her sister would have dropped a few tears just to extinguish the remains of my smouldering ashes; nay, one tear each, which would make only a pair between them, would have perfectly satisfied me. As it was, I could only pull over my desk and look at the paper, and mumble it, and finally doze off in the midst of a brilliant château en espagne, in which every thing I had in the world (not a great deal, even, certainly) was being used by the young ladies in No. 20, without any compunction or hesitation.

On the morning of Christmas-eve I was at my window early. The servant had just retired after depositing my coffee-pot and toast-rack on to table, when a cab drove up to No. 20, and a visitor with some luggage arrived. Never shall I forget my feelings as I looked at that cab. I knew it. I had recognized him as my rival. In what? will naturally be asked, and as natural will be the answer, "I am sure I do not know." The fact indeed is that he was gaining access to that enchanted floor, and about to have social intercourse with those fair creatures who were all a dream to me. How to describe him? Even now—and some years have passed since then—his figure rises before me. He was that Christmas visitor. I saw him for the first time.

He was tall (I am great height myself), and slight, and dark—dark, yes to the very mustache, which was, like himself, thin. Then his dress, which I at once pronounced "stylish," was in keeping with his figure and style; and if he wore one thing worse than another it was leather gaiters. Heaven only knows why I hated him! I can not better describe him than by saying he was exactly the picture of the villain one sees on the stage.

It took a very short time for the cab—and-a-half mine was pretty cool when I turned to it—to see how they received that man. Every one came out to welcome him—father, mother, and daughters. The father clapping him on the back and wringing his hand, the mother kissing him, and the two maidservants quarrelling for the honor of carrying his portmanteau. And, what was worse than all, I am afraid I saw him kiss the girls just as the hall-door was being shut. I left the table with my breakfast (as ices only made me worse. Helena made tea, and Hermia handed attendance cakes). Through the window I could see her stoop over the fender, bringing away successive hot plates, while through the other I could see their destination was to be heaped up with choice viands for the diabolical stranger.

Then he must go out to walk with them! Nothing less would do, and bring them home in a cab just before it grew dark. I saw a sleet spread on the window-sill, and every thing piled upon it, and then the girls, with the villain's aid, began to decorate the lamps and picture-frames.

What a blessing I was awake when this little play began, and what a happy hour they chose for it! The girls had on their white dresses, and floated about from mirror to picture, from picture to lamp, like the Peris in the illustrated Lalla Rookh. Then it was I learned a secret which tuned down my burning hatred, and left only a strong dislike in its place.

Helena stood on a chair and dressed the lamp; probably she took this duty on account of her superior height; perhaps the villain recommended it, for to that person beside her, and, breaking the holly and pelletrie into small pieces, handed them up to her. Hermia flitted about the room doing such work as came within the reach of her short arms when standing on a chair. I could see the gleam of her dress as, after putting up her sprays, she would jump down, and moving back, look at the effect from a little distance, and then dart forward and put some refractory stems out of sight. Then I saw her take an armful of the evergreens and descend to the dining-room to continue her work there. I was so engaged in watching her, and the strong fire lighted up the room so gloriously—I could see the very flowers in her hair—that I forgot to give any attention to the progress of the drawing-room decorations, but when I did look I saw more than was meant for the eye of the public.

Honor bright! with the golden rule in my memory, I am not going to betray a confidence so unwittingly given. If the villain never committed a crime of greater magnitude than to stand steadying Miss Helena by encircling her waist with his arms, his forgiveness is his memory! It is not for me to cast the first stone. I have done worse things myself in my day. Nor was it exactly extortion, the villain exacting half the fruit-pie that was going from her high position and replacing her in it.

Once Hermia caught them in the act of balancing their debtor and creditor account in this fashion. She may have laughed, but I could not hear it, only I saw the gesture of amusement, the uplifted hands, and could fancy some lively sally at the lovers' expense, when she ran from the room closely followed by the indignant villain, who seemed to demand instant vengeance. That she had made good her escape I doubted not, for the next moment I saw her opening the hall-door to her father, when his familiar knock warned me of the quiet street. Then with what interest I watched them all assemble for dinner round the drawing-room fire. Helena and her villain stood together at different sides of the group, but I could follow Hermia's face as it turned from one culprit to the other in a threatening then, and with a man once Helena shook her head and finger at her when it could be done without observation.

For some weeks afterward I was confined to my bed.

It was the twelfth of February, and I had finished the reading of the morning news to the last of the advertisements, and found myself pondering over it in a most unaccountable way. It treated of valentines, and, although in the wrong terms, how cheap and brilliant and loving and original they could be had at a certain shop not a hundred miles distant from where I lay.

Then I pictured some silly fellow sending a bought valentine to Hermia. To Hermia! I writhed at the thought. Hermia sitting as the villain would do! I said, and my old hatred to him woke up fiercely at the bare supposition. As I thus tortured myself with possibilities, scarcely even probabilities, of others worshiping at the same shrine I did, an idea suddenly burst upon me. I sprang up from the couch. "By Jove! I shall send her one myself! I shall send them each one, and no one can accuse me of undue partiality!" (The more reader will have detected long before this the state of my young affections.)—But," I said, "I shall make sure of Hermia's first; I shall not stop, or have a fit, or something that would prevent me writing a second;" and that my lack of confidence in my own nerve was justified by the subsequent events the reader will soon see. To choose a metre, to choose a subject, to fit my rhymes—why need I dwell on these troublous mysteries of the poetical aspirant to poetic fame? At last, having been guided in the first by my choice of the second—an Irish legend I had read years before—I wrote the following verses to Hermia, and I hope I shall receive a pardon on the score of my youth when I freely confess that I thought them very fine indeed, and far, very far beyond the average:

My little neighbor, lead a pretty ear,
And I will tell a tale you all should hear:
In far-off sea I found it long ago,
And in the world you will find it also.

Two isles in there gleaming side by side,
But severed by a cloudy veil of deep;
So fair and bright the flower of far-off times
Called them "The Joyless Maidens of the Stranger."

For there beneath the waters calm and fair
Their gold and silver crowns with azure zones,
Lie rotting fits of misery a goodly ship,
And over it slowly weave whitening bones.

And now a beacon stands on either rock
To guide the mariner through the treacherous sea;
In each, when first I knew them long ago,
A solitary keeper watch did keep.

Yet not alone; for each one had a child,
A boy that borrowed like a rabbit in the sand,
With him—father, mother, and kept the house,
And gathered "John o' Groats" and cockleps on the island.

Of course you seize my story by the end,
And how I came where these two were, I hope;
Pray grant me patience in my meandering tale,
I don't know myself how—'twas a telescope!

FOR THE BOY GROWING UPTO MAN'S ESTATE,
SURELY MANY AN HOUR'S THOUGHTFUL CARE,
WATCHING A SMALL DARK SPECK UPON THE SHORE,
WHERE DAILY WAS THE MAIDEN WONT TO PASS.

Then by degrees he learned a little skill,
Made from some sea-drift cast upon the shore,
And spent almost his tiny chest of toil,
And sailed away to sunny Hollo-More.

But I must reach my navel, so shall skip
The tender meeting on the yellow strand,
And tell you how it fell upon a day
The twelve maidens walked hand in hand.

And still she cried, "Say, Owen, am I fair?"
And at the question every happy voice grew soft,
Aye, gravely said, "Yes, dearest; fair to me!"
As he had answered many a time and oft.

Then suddenly she plucked her hand away,
And flung to him a pretty packwood yarn;
"Am I not fair in other eyes?" she cried;
"Fair as the maidens in the far-off town?"

And as he gravely smiled, he took her hand,
And answer made—"Nay, 'tis a thing of tests;
I loved you ere I vaulted this plump round arm,
Or laid a finger on your dainty waist.

"LOVED ERE I KNEW A PRAYING OF YOUR FACE,
WAS BLIND BEFORE I SAW THE DIMPLE THERE.
WHAT IF MY LOVE'S GROWN TO ALL MEN'S EYES?
SO, DEAREST, YOU ARE STILL MY FAIREST FAIR."

Then I transcribed the verses with great care, writing the earth verse and the last in capitals, that they might point the moral I felt a delicacy in drawing more openly, and I considered this as a decidedly tilting hint.

By this time my poor Muse was pumped dry. Yet, still undaunted, I cried, "Now for Helena's! Doubtless she villain will write her half a dozen at least, so I shall confine myself to a vrioverie; some good standard verses will be very respectful and respectable." So I cast about in my mind what poet should be honored by selecting from. Of right I ought to have told her "her eyes were lode-stars, and her tongue's sweet air," etc., but I had never heard her tongue, and what swayed me most of all was that the rest of the passage was exceedingly unmanageable.

In a volume of Poe's poems I found the nicest, tiniest set of verses, and so near the end of the book that I flattered myself it was not observed by those who had read so far. These are the lines I wrote out for Helena, drawing a fine capital letter at the beginning of each verse, in what I then considered a very high style of art:

"Helen! thy beauty is to me
Like those Nicean barks of yore,
That gently o'er a perfumed sea
The weary wayworn wanderer bore
To his own native shore.

"On desperate seas long wont to roam,
Thy hyacinth hair, thy classic face,
Thy Naiad airs have brought me home
To the glory that was Greece,
And the grandeur that was Rome.

"Ah me! how exquisitely dear
How steadfast I see thee stand,
The agate lamp within thy hand,
Ah! Psyche, from the regions which Are Holy-Land!"

My brains had been so much taxed in producing Hermia's original valentine that I felt very happy indeed to be able to produce Helena's at such a degree rate; and when both these verses were all fairly written out in an ornamental style, I felt quite as proud of them as if I had composed them myself. My conception was, at times I began to imagine they were little airy trifles I had thrown off in moments stolen from severer studies, and not Edgar Allan Poe's at all.

I put each valentine into an envelope, and the two envelopes into one large one, leaving with a very large seal that had been my grandfather's in days when old gentlemen wore their watches with bunch of seals attached to them by a broad black ribbon.

To address a letter to people whose names I did not know more than some people appear a difficulty; but I soon got over that.

To the young Ladies at
No. 20 — Street.
(One Each.)

seemed a simple solution of the difficulty; and to bed at last I went, very tired, but very proud of my night's work.

The next day, the 13th, I determined they should be posted; and, after keeping the letter back until it was impossible for it could be delivered before the next morning, I sent the servant to drop it into the nearest pillar-post.

The next day I received a visit from the father of the young ladies, who had "found me out." At first he was a little vexed to be severe with me. But it turned out that he had known my father at college, and he concluded to forgive me, and invited me to dine with him that evening. His name was Wotten.

When the hall-door shut I got up on the table and threw open the window.

My first act was to take out my evening suit of clothes, which had not seen the light since I left the country for London. My next was to brush them thoroughly, a piece of labor which can only be appreciated by a person in the weak state of health in which I then was. But was I not going to dine at No. 20?

Never, not even on my wedding morning (a few months ago), did I bestow such care on my toilet as on that memorable occasion. I sent out and purchased six new white ties, but after trying them all, one after another, and being dissatisfied with the result, was obliged to go in an ordinary black one. Then I left the room.

Then my collar was unsatisfactory. How is it that loneliness will not turn over a fellow's collars when up to the ninth comers alike? I prefamily wished my washer-woman certain punishments nameless to earn polite.

Others were brought, selected.

Then my necktied rolled away, and find it I could not though I searched every corner.

Grief the Third.

But grief of griefs, worst of all, when I got into my coat, I found I had grown so much since my linen, that the cuff of the coat came barely to where the cuff of my shirt began.

Grief the Fourth.

In a word, I was in a fever of despair long before my toilet was completed, and barely able to drag my weary feet across the street about five minutes before six o'clock.

Had I been stronger and healthier I might have detected a smirk, slightly subdued, on the face of the maid who showed me up stairs, for I believe my history had even reached the lamentable ears of Mary Jane; but I was too much kept by such unwonted exertion to be conscious of any thing but that an introduction was before me to Helena and Hermia.

I advanced into the drawing-room, saw four people, had my hand shaken by Mr. Walton, and in one great effort to make three bows to three ladies staggered and fell fainting against some one, Paterfamilias, I believe. When I recovered consciousness I was on the sofa, and Mr. Walton standing by me: Mrs. Walton was giving me a glass of wine, and Hermia stood at a little distance with the decanter in her hand.

I blurted out some apology, and Mr. Walton said to a gentleman, kindly way:

"Well, you are a pretty fellow! This is what you call being quite able to get on to dinner! I think a good meal to tell your doctor!"

But I declared I was perfectly well, and only a little giddy, and being unaccustomed to the glare air, and was very indignant at not being believed. I was not allowed to go down to dinner; but the parboiled (minus the marble) brought me up some soup, of which no praises could be too great; after my landlady's watery decoctions it was the ambrosial nectar. Other things equally good followed, and I fell asleep at last, not without a slight dread that I might have been asleep all the time, and would awake presently in my own lodgings.

I did not, however, but awoke in No. 20 to see Helena and Hermia reading by the fire-light as I had seen them dozens of times before. I was afraid to stir lest it should break the spell that was over me, but lay watching them, and wishing every minute would be an hour long.

Then the parents came up and we had lights, and a little more of the pleasantest nothing. I think I never hear Mozart's masses without remembering that evening; and when the "Agnus Dei" from the First Mass is played by any one even now, I feel that inexpressible peace steal over my soul that fell upon it that night when I heard Helena Walton touch it for the first time so beautifully, with a full feeling of its wondrous beauty shining on of every sentence.

I went home at last. Mr. Walton saw me into my own room and charged me to go at once to bed, and though I obeyed him, sleep was out of the question.

Not so charming as I imagined! Yes, a hundred times more charming! No wonder I could not sleep. Again and again came the picture of the drawing-room I had left. Mr. Walton lying in an arm-chair by fire, telling me I need not be homesick I felt quite able and inclined, Hermia and her mother at their work, with Hermia's head bent over hers just in the way, and Helena at the piano, heightening the beauty and enjoyment of the scene.

Next day I was too tired to rise; but in the evening Mr. and Mrs. Walton kindly came over to see me; I was in the drawing-room then, and Mrs. Walton insisted on my pouring out for us, though I own to feeling for the first time that the cups were cumbersome and common, and that the tea in a cheap japanned bread-basket was not what she was accustomed to.

After that I spent many an evening at No. 20, and the girls and I became fast friends, even to laughing over the two valentines, which, at their urgent entreaty, I returned to them for, Mr. Walton had left them with me the day he called. I was soon established on a confidential footing in the family, and Christmas arrived with more violent competition with the villain (who properly was called Smith) and Helena in the matter of decorating—they pretended to declaring Hermia and I were a pair of bunglers.

These were not their real names, however, though I have been for the last three years addressed by She whom I called Helena was properly Joan, and the fairy Hermia had been baptized Agnes; and I lay down on my bed to laugh at the recollection of the evening when my thus naming them came to be known.

I had come one evening uninvited, saying, as an excuse to Mrs. Walton, that I had brought Miss Helena some photographs and Miss Hermia some Honolulu postage stamps.

"Miss Helena and Miss Hermia?" Mamma Walton said, inquiringly.

I stammered out, "Your daughters," which satisfied her, not being of an inquisitive disposition; but I told the girls afterward, amusing them no little.

I said, "You know when I am here I address you as Miss Agnes; but when I am at home I still think of you as Hermia."

And this anecdote was soon added to the lists of facts we had in common; and if I brought the marbles, as I often did when I knew a party was approaching, I ticketed them "Helena's" and "Hermia's."

In due course of time Joan became Mrs. Smith, and went off with the villain; and about the same time I became, where it mattered not, a man of independent means.

St. Valentine's Day was drawing near again, only a few weeks off, and I was sitting in the drawing-room, after dinner, with Mr. and Mrs. Walton and Hermia.

"You will only have one valentine to send this year, Gilbert," Mr. Walton said, with a sigh. "It used to be 'one each,' eh! Ah! we shall miss Joan!"

"By Jove!" I said to myself, "here is an opening not to be despised."

"No, Sir," I said, "I am going to ask you for a valentine for myself. I am sure you know as well as I do what Hermia—I mean Agnes. You and Mrs. Walton know me so well now I have nothing to say, but that I shall try every day to be more worthy of her."

I was too husky to say more, and Agnes having slipped from the room, I had lost a good deal of courage.

There was a little silence, and Mr. Walton shook my hand silently.

"It is what we fathers come to," he said.

I rose and went round to where Mrs. Walton sat by the fire in an arm-chair. There were tears on her face.

"And you?" I asked, tremblingly.

"Agnes must decide," she said; and though I knew how that would be I was glad of the permission to make my escape, and going up stairs, found her sitting by the drawing-room fire.

She had not expected me up so soon, but there was no need to ask her then, for I knew it long before, that I had found my valentine.

I got her altogether into my care on the next St. Valentine's Day, and we were then, and are now, as happy as the manner days is long.

My wife signs herself Agnes Bennett: it is legally her name; but when we sit together by our own fireside, her hand in mine, she, better still, she sits upon my knee. I call her by the name by which I knew her first—and loved her—Hermia.

EXTRAORDINARY APPLICATION OF PHOTOGRAPHY.

It has been often asserted that the eyes of dead persons would be found to contain images of objects seen immediately before death, and the correspondent of a London paper at Florence makes known what we believe is the first instance of an official test of the theory. His narrative is as follows:

On the 13th of last April, Luisa Benucci, a woman in a comparatively humble rank of life, but of respectable character, who let lodgings, was found murdered in her apartment in the following circumstances: The corpse was discovered lying on the floor, with the throat cut from ear to ear, a pool of blood below the head, and the appearance of traces of blood in any other part of the room—and a pocket-handkerchief, the property of some one unknown, close by the corpse. Information was immediately given, she was supposed to have about her had disappeared, as well as other articles in the house. As no cries had been heard by the neighbors, the conclusion come to by the Florence police was to the effect that the murder had been perpetrated, in all probability, by two assassins, who had obtained admittance into the house when the poor woman was alone, under the pretext of wishing to see and hire her rooms; and upon her refusing to do so, drawing a pocket-handkerchief over her mouth and brought her to the ground, and that, while the one held her down her cries effectually stifled, his accomplice had cut her throat. Such was the conclusion come to by the police, and, in particular, by the Cavaliere Tenerani, Commissario di Publica Vigilanza, Leopoldo Viti—who, among other steps taken by him at the time, applied to the highest authorities for and had granted him on whom he was dependent for permission to have the eyes of the murdered woman photographed—an application which, in the then state of painting it could lead to no practical result, was refused.

The police were not without suspicion as to one at least of the perpetrators of the crime. Suspicion rested on the person of a certain Benjamino dei Cosimi, a native of Velletri, who, from that town, where he was known to be poor, had come to Florence but one month before, had made his way to Corsica, thence to Leghorn, and from Leghorn to Florence, where he had been observed prowling about the house at the time of the murder. On the discovery of the murder he had absented himself from his lodging-house of nearly two months, on the 2d of June, another lodging-house keeper, Ester Colisi, was found murdered in her bed-room, under circumstances similar. The body stretched on the floor, the throat cut from ear to ear, the strange pocket-handkerchief lying beside the corpse, every thing, in fact, pointing to the same hand when the poor creature was alone in the dwelling. There was no clew to the assassins beyond the extremely suspicious circumstance that the murders had been committed by the same hands. Again application was made by the head of the police to have the eyes of the murdered woman photographed, for the same reasons as before, the application was refused.

Another interval of somewhat more than two months had elapsed, when, on the 23d of August, a third murder, differing scarcely at all in its circumstances from the two previous ones, was perpetrated on the person of a third lodging-house keeper, Emilia Spagnoli. As in the two former instances, the body was found lying on the floor (on the left side), the throat cut as before; the handkerchief was not wanting; but the eyes were. Then, for the first time, photograph, possessed a strong, wiry frame, had probably irritated her murderer by an unusually vigorous resistance, for the hands were cut about other parts of the body, especially the hands, the wounds being seventeen in all.

Countersigned warrants for the third murder, Benjamino dei Cosimi had reappeared in Florence. He was arrested. In his possession were found articles belonging to all three murdered women. His clothes stained knife, the blood freshly shed. On these presumptions he has been consigned to prison, and there awaits his trial. It is not to be denied that many of ill-will between the inhabitants of Florence and those of Velletri, any more than there exists a Velletri party protective of one of its sons. It is probable that, in the event of his being condemned for all the three crimes, the sentence will not be viewed as any peculiar severity, even by his own fellow-citizens. But now comes the circumstance by which the history of this case will be distinguished from that of mere ordinary criminals. Viti, the head of the Florence police, again insisted with no small importunity on having the eyes of the murdered, the last of the three victims, photographed, that his request was complied with.

Under the direction of the Cavaliere, the examining judge, or Giudice d'Istruzione, a series of photographic experiments have been carried on, not for the special purpose of furnishing additional collateral evidence for conviction (as the other evidence, with that view, is believed to be superabundant), but in order to establish a general principle, or law, of universal or very frequent application. I have said that Emilia Spagnoli was found lying on her left side, her large glazed right eye being turned upward. The eye was photographed immediately after her decease. The photograph has been taken has been reproduced in a greatly magnified form; is greatly magnified as to allow the lineaments of a human face, two inches in length, to stand out distinctly from the same. When I mention that Alinari, the first photographer of Florence, and indeed possessing a European reputation, was the artist by whom the work was executed, I need say nothing more as a guarantee of the fidelity and care employed in the execution. From the tracing of the dim and nebulous outline, as actually found on the eye, to the completest outline of the face executed from that tracing by an artist who had never seen Benjamino dei Cosimi, or any portrait of the man, and, again, from that completed outline of the two photographs of himself found in his possession at the time of his arrest—the transition, whether viewed as an artistic study, or as a great question of medical jurisprudence, is startling to the utmost degree of interest and importance. I am not, indeed, prepared to affirm that the first tracing in the series, as shown to me by the secretary of the Judge of Instruction, Signor Marabotti, at his official chambers, so confidently resembles the photograph of the living man that, were I placed in a jury-box, my verdict would be determined by the belief in their identity, but of the following fact there can not be the possibility of doubt. Whatever there is of marked prominent individuality in that first nebulous profile has an exactly corresponding feature in the likeness of the living prisoner. A peculiar dilatation of the nostril, a depression in the centre of the upper lip (Benjamino dei Cosimi has lost his two front teeth), an unusual elongation of the mouth, a square but double chin, a certain massiveness about the region of the cheek-bone, and, above all, a wholesale, are common to both. I purposely confine myself, in the present letter, to a simple statement of facts—the circumstances under which those matters were perpetrated, the consequent photographic experiments instituted, and the result obtained, of which I myself am aware. I am happy to add that Signor Signor Marabotti, with whom, from his official position, the prosecution of these inquiries rests, is evidently brought to his task a spirit worthy, in all respects, of a countryman of Galileo. The photographs, with all their minutiæ, and illustrative details, have been transmitted not only to the Medical College of Florence, but also to the medical colleges of Bologna and Pisa, and to the Commissario of the Prefect of Florence, Count Cantelli, a series of photographic experiments will be instituted on the eyes of the patients in the hospital immediately after their decease.

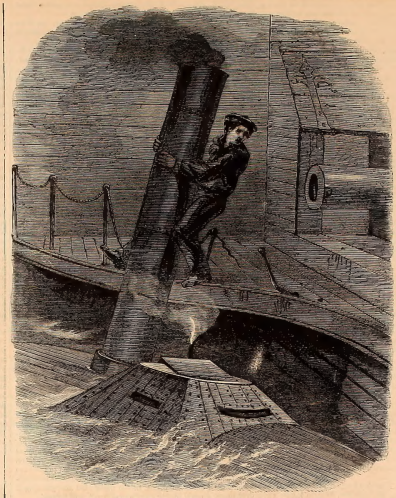
BUSINESS OF THE TELEGRAPHERS.—Before the telegraph operators become old men, however, ingenious blunderers were of frequent occurrence from the necessary amazingly in business matters and at a blow. A manager of a telegraph company gives an instance as of recent occurrence and which is probably true to the letter. A gentleman sent a dispatch requesting parties in New York to forward immediately by express. When the message was delivered it read thus: Forward sample for E. B. The parties were required to forward sample of sausage. E. S. wanted. Of course the gentleman came to the office and complained that the dispatch had been misinterpreted incorrectly, and the operator promised to repeat it. Accordingly he sent another dispatch, to the surprise that the dispatch should have read, Forward sample forks. The New Yorkers supposed that it was wrong in the first instance, could not decipher it differently now. He replied that he had done his best. E. S. and E. B. also figured it. "But," returned the Boston operator, "I did not say for E. S., but for E. S." "Why," was the reply, "what fellow is in Boston?" exclaimed the New York operator, "I'll be sure to find him out." "Well," was the reply, "the Boston operator tried for an hour to make the New York operator send E. S. without succeeding, he wrote the dispatch upon a slip of paper, and forwarded it by mail; and a mail-route is a standing joke upon the line for many months afterward.

THE NATURAL PHILOSOPHER AND THE CAT.—I once paid a French visitor, who was a natural philosopher, and to amuse apply place a cat under the glass receiver of an air-pump, for the purpose of showing that life can not be kept up in a vacated without air and respiration. The lecturer had laid his hand upon the animal, with the intention to put it, exhaust the receiver of its air, when the cat, who began to feel itself incommoded, struggled in the ravelled stratagem, was fortunate enough to discover the source from whence most uneasiness proceeded, and, with a sudden spring, to bolt through which the air escaped, and thus prevented any more from entering the glass receiver. All the contributions of the philosopher were now unavailing: in vain he turned the pump, in vain he tried to exhaust the air in its operation. Hoping to effect his purpose, he again laid as upon the receiver, but the cat, as before, put forward its withdrew her paw from the aperture; but whenever he attempted to exhaust the receiver of its air, when the cat, who began to feel the pressure of the atmosphere

JOHN H. ROCK, COLORED COUNSELOR.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY RICHARDS, PHILADELPHIA.]

JOHN H. ROCK, COLORED COUNSELOR.



WE give on this page a portrait of JOHN H. ROCK, the colored lawyer who was on February 2 admitted as a practitioner before the Supreme Court of the United States, on motion of the Honorable CHARLES SUMNER. Mr. ROCK is known in Boston as a first-class lawyer. This event, following two days after the passage by Congress of the proposition to amend the Constitution so as to abolish slavery in the United States, will be regarded by the future historian as a remarkable indication of the revolution which is going on in the sentiment of a great people. Mr. ROCK has never been a slave. He represents the colored freeman, as Mr. DOUGLASS represents the freedman. This extraordinary reversal of the DRED SCOTT decision is an act almost sublime. It is related of ÆSOP, who had been born a slave, that the Athenians erected a statue to his memory, or as PHÆDRUS has it:

Servumque posuere in æterna basi.

The Supreme Court of the United States has taken one of a race crushed down to the earth with its own most solemn sanction, has taken one who merely by the chance of birth was not himself a slave, and has placed him not indeed in marble, in æterna basi,

but upon "the enduring pedestal" of an honorable citizenship.

INCIDENT ON BOARD THE "OCTORARA," JANUARY 30, 1865.

INCIDENT ON BOARD THE "OCTORARA."

THE incident illustrated in the above cut is thus narrated by our correspondent: "On the night of the 26th a torpedo-boat came out from Mobile Bay, and made an unsuccessful attack upon the Octorara. At about 2 A.M., though the night was very dark, an object was discovered not many yards astern, and making direct for the vessel. The look-out hailed lustily, 'Boat ahoy!' The response came, 'Ay, ay!' as though from one of our own boats. The officer of the deck immediately sang out to them to 'lie on their oars;' to which they answered, 'Ay, ay!' A moment after they rasped along the vessel's side from aft forward to the guards. The knowledge that it was the torpedo-boat of the rebels now flashed upon all. The intrepidity of the captain of the after-guard is worthy of the highest praise. Though all expected momentarily to be blown up, this man, seeing how readily they could gain an advantage over the enemy by prompt action, grasped her smoke-pipe as it came by the guards of the ship, at the same time crying out lustily for a rope to make the devil fast with. The remaining sailors, acting under different impulses, recoiled to the opposite side of the deck. Several shots were fired at this brave man, and as his exertions were hardly sufficient to retain his hold upon the hot pipe, he preferred to let go rather than be dragged overboard."

NEGRO QUARTERS, ARMY OF THE JAMES.—[SKETCHED BY CAPTAIN L. L. LANGDON.]

SPRING AND SUMMER FASHIONS FOR 1865.

FURNISHED BY MESSRS. CARTER, KIRTLAND, & CO., MANUFACTURERS AND JOBBERS OF CLOTHING, NO. 340 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

GENTLEMEN'S SPRING AND SUMMER FASHIONS FOR 1865.

THE above engraving will convey a fair idea of some of the styles which MESSRS. CARTER, KIRTLAND & CO. have projected for their spring jobbing business. No better evidence can be afforded of the stability and confidence of the country during a prolonged war than the steady, quiet progress of the various branches of industry and trade. The Clothing Trade has participated to the fullest extent in the general activity.

The wholesale clothing business rests upon a permanent and enduring basis. Intelligent capitalists have so developed it that it now occupies the first business-rank, vying in importance with any of the great commercial or industrial interests of the age. But its successful prosecution requires a peculiar combination of talent. Long experience in the trade, thorough knowledge of the wants and tastes of the public, skill in designing the patterns, and rare business talents are indispensably necessary to success; and to these must be added large capital. MESSRS. CARTER & KIRTLAND have every department of the business under the strictest supervision, and such confidence and satisfaction is felt in their productions that the most fastidious find them as elegant and serviceable as the best custom-work. A variety of circumstances conspire to vary the fashions of succeeding seasons, but generally every new year marks an improvement. The styles for 1865 which we instance will be found far more acceptable, in simplicity and elegance, to the public than those of previous years. The same improvement may also be seen in the materials made up by responsible houses. So much taste would be uselessly bestowed upon flimsy fabrics. The same judgment which impels the clothiers to design superior patterns suggests the embodiment of them in fine and durable cloths.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR FEBRUARY.

FOR full dress, the 1865 season is characterized by a marked preference, as to color, for black, violet, and black and white robes. The femmes élégantes have adopted the black and white with such tenacity that the combination may be expected to take its run through all the capitals that look toward Paris for the indication of its choice. Such toilets, although a little sombre, are refreshing after the extreme richness of color which predominated during the last year, when glaring attraction was often obtained at the sacrifice of good taste.

Passementerie ornaments have resumed their importance for the trimmings of dresses, in the ornamentation of which an excessive luxury is once more displayed. In many instances it is the most costly portion of the toilet.

The present style of bonnets and head-dresses simplifies their description. The lanchon is the taste of the day, and is so small as to appear altogether diminutive in the presence of a lady's ordinary cap. A small piece of velvet or of lace, a few flowers, a bird, an eagle's or a crow's feather, or a plume of a peacock's plumage, furnish the elements of which the slight Parisian chapeau is created. For grand toilette velvet and lace bonnets, ornamented with feathers, are mostly worn.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

Fig. 1. Carriage Dress.—The principal feature of this toilet is the bonnet-jacket, or long pelisse, which may also be worn at home as a robe de chambre. It is usually of light-colored cloth, lined with wadding. The under-skirt may be either of the same or of a different color, but the material employed should be moire or velvet. The narrow collar, or pelerine, is trimmed with worsted or chenille fringe. The fanchon of our Illustration is composed of gray velvet, with a narrow white blonde and black lace trimming.

Fig. 2. Dress for a Soirée.—Robe of pearl-gray satin, ornamented round the skirt with two bands of passementerie; the upper one is of black tulle pointed, to appearance; the lower band is made pleated upon the satin skirt. The tulle jupe is drawn up on one side by a long chain of large jet beads disposed in the manner shown in our engraving. The bertha is in black and white lace and blonde. The head-dress is the coiffure grecque, with a series of amber beads placed at regular distances in the netting.

Fig. 3. Walking Dress.—This dress is in dark blue moire antique, and is fastened in front with large buttons, either of jet, mirrors, or in mother-of-pearl; the trimming consists of black detached velvet edged with a narrow guipure. The velvet ornamentation may be advantageously replaced by satin, if preferred. The chapeau is a velvet fanchon ornamented with a bird and a rose.

THE WIND THROUGH THE KEYHOLE.

HARK! to the low wind sighing, so sad, so bleak, so cold.
It comes like the voice of a wailing ghost, full of misery untold.
It tells of endless sorrow, of fire and parting wreck,
And of the bare rope pressing round a choking creature's neck.

It comes from storm-swept raging seas, and from the wild morass;
From wandering round the ruined towers in many a land it has passed;
From whistling against prison-bars, and over miles of snow,
Where the lying mother and her child crouch to the Cossack's blow.

From long forgotten battle-fields, where the grass grows coarse and rank;
From the vivers-makers fishing against the shoal's sunk bank;
From forests madly tossing before the shattering storm;
From moors where, on the gibbet, the body hangs still warm.

Come, children, then together, and pray for drowning men.
For suffering creatures, floating faint on wreck far from our ken.
Pray for all human sorrow, for all who are suffering now,
By sword or storm, by sea or land, in this our world below.

WHEELER & WILSON'S SEWING MACHINES WOMAN'S GREATEST BOON.—We would advise a man to forego a threshers, and thresh wheat with a flail, rather than to see the wife wear her health, vigor, and life away in the everlasting stitch, stitch, stitch, when a sewing machine can be obtained. The Wheeler & Wilson is an invaluable addition to every household. We have had several kinds on trial, and, after six years' service, the Wheeler & Wilson has taken the precedence as the best. We have all kinds of sewing are to be done in a family.—American Agriculturist, Jan., 1865.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

GIVE NATURE A LIFT.

People expect too much of Nature. They trifle with their health and their constitutions, and then are surprised that they are sick.

The pressure of constant mental or bodily labor upon the natural powers is tremendous. Very few systems and constitutions can bear up against this pressure unassisted. Add to this the numerous influences which lurk around the air we breathe, the water we drink, the artificial heat with which we warm and drive away the cold and now-searching moisture of winter, and it would seem to require more than ordinary vigor to keep the human health at this rigorous season without reinforcing the physical energies. How are they to be reinforced? Certainly not by adulterated stimulants. There is no poison in the outer air of the most crowded of farmer-loaded rooms, or workshops, or factories, so pernicious as these deadly-burning fluids. What can do them? Can HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS, a vegetable tonic without alloy, are every day demonstrating, has ever been known to fail? Its herbs and debilitated so harmless in its nature, so powerful in its tonic effects, as this celebrated STOMACHIC AND ALTERATIVE.

In the autumn and early in new settlements, and in crowded cities, by old and young, rich and poor, it is used as a PREVENTIVE AND RESTORATIVE MEDICINE, with the most gratifying results.

Brandreth's Pills.

They expel the poisons which threaten life. Every time a sick person is purged by this vegetable remedy he has less virulent humors and more life and vigor, as any one can prove by taking a dose. Persons of spare habits gain flesh and strength while using them. Every time we rout a few days or weeks from the purgation we make new fluids for our food, which repair the unsound parts that the Pills have caused to be evacuated. Each time we repeat this process we expel further quantities of impurities, which are again replaced by fluids less and less impure, so that in a short time, by continuing this treatment, we bring back the whole mass of fluids or humors to that state of purity which constitutes health; for Brandreth's Pills only take away humors which are unsound.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box, ever-spot in America. Purchase none unless the PRIVATE GOVERNMENT STAMP is on the box. Sent upon it B. BRANDRETH in white letters.

Office, No. 100 Broadway.

OFFICERS

PRESIDENT—CHAS. H. APPLEGATE,

(OF C. H. Applegate & Bro., No. 55 Broadway.)

VICE-PRESIDENT—JOHN L. DOUGLASS.

(SECRETARY Brookville Petroleum Company.)

TREASURER—HIRAM G. BOND,

(OF Bond, Tuttle & Co.)

SECRETARY—JOHN O. HOYT,

(COMMERCIAL MERCHANT, No. 5 Cedar Street.)

GENERAL SUPERINTENDENT—MAHLON S. FROST,

(OF Titusville, Pa.)

BANKERS—DUNCAN, SHERMAN & CO.,

(Corner of Nassau and Pine Streets.)

PROPERTY NO. 1.—SEVENTY BARRELS OF OIL DAILY.

A perpetual lease of one acre and a half of land, across the celebrated Buchanan Farm, at the Junction of Oil Creek and Cherry Run, in Venango County, Pa., where wells producing seventy barrels daily, of which one half goes to the First National Petroleum Company.

The present supply of oil is equivalent in value to the purchase of dividends of at least two per cent. monthly to the stockholders on their investment.

First Dividend of Ten per Cent. for February.

Several new wells will immediately be sunk by the Company. Engines, tools, and tubing now on the ground.

PROPERTY NO. 2.—FORTY ACRES OF THE HAVEN FARM.

The property, owned in fee, by the heirs of Pierce, on both sides of Cherry Run, in a direct line between the "Noble" well, which flowed 2000 barrels per day, and the new 300-barrel well on Pithole Creek owned by the U. S. Petroleum Co., and by the Pithole Petroleum Co. One hundred new wells are now going down between the Haven Farm and the Pithole Creek Wells, and the last has been struck on the Northern verge of the land.

Six new wells will be sunk on the property during the spring and summer. No well has ever been bored on Cherry Run without striking oil.

PROPERTY NO. 3.—FIVE WELLS NOW GOING DOWN.

A parcel of land in fee, adjoining property No. 1, on Cherry Run. Five wells now being bored—one having reached the depth of over 1000 feet. The First National Petroleum Co. has a landed interest in all the oil produced without payment of any royalty or rental to the U. S. "Read" well, of 230 barrels, the "Fraser" and "Adams," of 150 barrels each, are within a few rods near by.

PROPERTY NO. 4.—117 ACRES OF THE EDWARDS FARM.

All on Oil Creek, just above Titusville, and owned in fee. Regarded by many as the richest piece of land in the flour oil properties in Pennsylvania. Value of the land only authenticated by responsible parties at not less than $1,000 per acre.

Property No. 5.—590 Acres in West Virginia.

Two tracts of land, 590 acres in all, immediately on the Little Kanawha and Duckard Creek in West Virginia, five to the First National Petroleum Company seven-eighths of all the oil. The property is near the noted Burning Springs Well, and in the great upheaval range, which has always been found to contain oil in large quantities. Wells will be sunk immediately.

PROPERTY NO. 6.

A lease of 999 acres of Petroleum oil-bearing lands, also on Little Kanawha River, and Duckard Creek, in the vicinity of Property No. 5.

THE RESERVED SHARES.—ALL STOCKHOLDERS ON AN EQUAL FOOTING.

Subscriptions will be received, until further notice, for a limited amount of the capital stock, at the fixed cash price of $3 a share, par value $5. Only those being full paid up stock, free from all assessment, and liabilities, in which respect the original subscribers and those who may now purchase their shares stand on precisely the same footing.

THE COMPANY'S WORKING OPERATIONS.

The working operations of the Company have been placed under the personal supervision of Mahlon S. Frost, Esq., of Titusville. Mr. Frost is a pioneer in the oil developments of Pennsylvania, and one of the largest and most experienced oil operators in the country. All the new wells will be sunk under his immediate direction.

U. S. 7-30 LOAN.

By authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, the undersigned has assumed the General Subscription Agency for the sale of 7-30 Three Year Treasury Notes, bearing seven and three tenths per cent. interest per annum, known as the

7-30 LOAN.

These Notes are issued under date of August 15th, 1864, and are payable three years from that date in currency, or are convertible at the option of the holder into

U. S. 5-20 Six per cent. GOLD-BEARING BONDS.

These bonds are now worth a premium of nine per cent., including gold interest from November, which makes the actual profit on the 7-30 loan, at current rates, including interest, about ten per cent. per annum, besides its exemption from taxation, which adds from one to three per cent. more, according to the rate levied on other property. The interest is payable semi-annually, and can be collected at most any point.

The interest amounts to

One cent per day on a $50 note.
Two cents " "	$100 " "
Ten " "	$500 " "
20 " "	$1000 " "
$1 " "	$5000 " "

Notes of all the denominations named will be promptly furnished upon receipt of subscriptions. This is now offered by the Government, and it is confidently expected that its superior advantages will make it the

THE ONLY LOAN IN MARKET

GREAT POPULAR LOAN OF THE PEOPLE.

Less than $200,000,000 remain unsold, which will probably be taken up in a few months at par, when the 7-30 notes will undoubtedly command a premium, as has uniformly been the case on closing the subscriptions to other Loans.

In order that the citizens of every town and section of the country may be afforded facilities for taking the loan, the National Banks, State Banks, and Private Bankers throughout the country are generally agreed to receive subscriptions at par. Subscribers will select their own agents, to whom they have confidence, and who only are to be responsible for the delivery of the notes for which they receive orders.

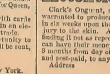
ARCANA WATCH.



An Elegant Novelty in Watches.

The case of this beautiful watch is entirely new invention, composed of six different metals combined, rolled together and then polished, producing a variegated surface, and called gold, called Arcana which will always keep its color. They are as beautiful and durable as solid gold, and are afforded at one-eighth the cost. The case is beautifully designed, with pearl and silver centre, with patent lever, keyless, and engraved in the exact style of the celebrated Gold Hunting Levers, and are truly handsome and durable, and so exact an imitation of gold as to defy detection. The movements are manufactured by the well-known E. Jumer Watch Company of Europe, and are superbly finished, having ruby pivot jewelled, finest curved bridges, adjusting regulator, with gold balances, and the improved ruby pin escapement, with the finest steel stemwinding, and is warranted a good time-keeper. These watches are of three sizes, the largest being designed for ladies, and are of stemwinding cases. A case of six will be sent by mail or express, C. O. D., to any one sent in an elegant morocco case for $25. Will readily sell for three times their cost. We are the only agents in the United States for this watch, and none are genuine which do not bear our trade-mark.

ARCANDALE & CO., Manufacturers of Jewelry, and dealers in Watches, Diamonds, &c., are now the largest manufacturers of goods will be sold for One Dollar Each.

In consequence of the general depression of trade in the manufacturing districts of England, through the war having closed the markets of the South, a large quantity of valuable Jewelry, originally intended for the English market, has been thrown upon our hands, and in order to CLOSE IT SOLD AT ANY SACRIFICE!

Certificates of Articles.—ARCANDALE & CO., acting as Agents for the principal European Manufacturers, have determined to SELL OFF their Stock by the following regulations:

Certificates of Articles, precise articles are first put into envelopes, sealed up, and mixed; and, when ordered, are sent by mail, according to choice, without any choice on the part of the purchaser. On receipt of the certificate you turn to send the dollar and take the article or not. Purchasers may thus obtain a Gold Watch, Diamond Ring, or any set of Jewelry or an Ear for ONE DOLLAR.

Send for Circular.

In all transactions by mail we shall charge for forwarding the certificate, postage on letters, and using the business, 25 cents each, which must be enclosed when the Certificate is sent for. Single certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $5; thirty for $10; one hundred for $25.

AGENTS.—We want agents in every regiment, and in every town and county in the country, and those acting as such will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered by them, provided their remittance amounts to One Dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE FOR FEBRUARY, 1865.

Important to Subscribers.

Subscribers to the MAGAZINE and WEEKLY will find upon the wrapper of each number a Statement of Account. The figures on the direction-label following the name, thus: "Dec'64," denote the month with the Subscription EXPIRES, as noted on our books. Every Subscriber may thus ascertain for himself when he should prepare credit for his remittance, and also when to renew his Subscription. As many complaints arise from subscribers not receiving a number to which payment is credited, we will thus avoid receiving duplicates, or missing any Number. It is desired that a Subscription should be renewed a few weeks BEFORE the expiration of the former Subscription, in order that our books should not be inconveniently pusted. Attention to this will obviate mis-entries of the kind which annoy both Subscribers and Publishers.

The subscription price is $20 per share for a limited amount of stock. No further call or assessment to be made on subscribers. $100,000 in reserve for a working capital, and $800,000 in stocks at par, for the future development of the Company's property.

Its property consists of a perpetual lease of about 75,000 acres of oil territory in San Luis Obispo County, State of California, lying on and near the Pacific Ocean, being all the following five ranches, viz.:

I. The Manuela Ranch, containing 16,564.83 acres.
II. The Arroyo Grande Ranch, containing 4437.38 acres.
III. The Balsa Chemical Ranch, containing 14,338.19 acres.
IV. The Pismo Ranch, containing 8888.89 acres.
V. The Stone Corral Ranch, containing 30,911.99 acres.

The titles of which lands have been thoroughly examined and approved by Judge Parsons, of San Francisco.

All reports, written and verbal, of gentlemen who, during the past year, have visited and thoroughly examined this property carefully and scientifically, concur in representing it as overflowing with Petroleum. They say: "The ranches are splendid estates, but their value is in their mineral deposits of Coal, Oil, and Gas."

The Company's lands extend for over ten miles on San Luis Bay, on the Pacific coast, with a good roadstead, where shipments can be made with facility to San Francisco, South America, Australia, China, and New York.

The lands have a gentle slope to San Luis Bay, and there is full evidence of the practicability of conducting the oil, at a moderate expense, through pipes from the wells to reservoirs or tanks, to be located at this point, when it can be sent to the markets of the world, either in its crude state or refined, according to the demand.

The cost of shipping will not exceed 35 cents per barrel, and the Company will be enabled to place Petroleum at New York at $5 per barrel, and at Australia and China at reduced rates.

It is designed to develop fully and practically the means and wealth of this property in the earliest practicable moment.

The varied details, giving all the information that can be required, with a general description of the character, advantages, and prospects of the Company's property, are fully and plainly set forth in the prospectus.

THE PACIFIC COAST PETROLEUM COMPANY, of New York, have been duly organized under the laws of the State, with a capital sufficient for their available liabilities and resources in what is believed to be an unlimited supply of Petroleum, not surpassed in quality.

Subscriptions, $100,000, of which $60,000 purchases the land—to wit, 67,960 acres. The remaining $150,000 is the permanent cash working capital of the Company.

Capital stock, $6,000,000. Par value of shares, $100. Subscribers to this purchase will receive eight shares of stock for each one hundred dollars subscribed. Lands located on the Little Kanawha and Elk Rivers, in the counties of Gilmer and Braxton, in the very heart of the oil regions of West Virginia.

Professor Hildreth even reports: "Your property is the very center of the West Virginia oil region. It has numerous oil and gas springs along the banks of its streams, one of which vies with the famous 'Burning Spring' itself."

Professor Shepherd, of New Haven, Conn., reports: "I consider it eminently oil-producing land. The oil-bearing shales underlie it extensively, and the fissures free of carbonated hydrogen, or illuminating gas springs, some of which I saw burning, as well as the appearance of oil itself on the surface of the tract, fully confirms me in this belief.

"There can be no doubt that along your creeks and tributaries there is a large extent of valuable oil-producing territory. The carboniferous system of Monticulous and cannel coal, iron ore, limestone, and fire-clays embodied in the high hills on your property, the tops and slopes of which are covered with an extraordinary growth of white oak and other heavy timbers, add immensely to its value."

These views are fully endorsed by the reports of the most precious and experienced men from the oil districts of both Pennsylvania and Virginia.

The Company consider themselves fortunate in having secured the services of Mr. Blackwell, a practical civil engineer, for the general superintendence, as well known as the late Chief Engineer and Superintendent of the "Commissioners of Washington Heights," New York City.

Arrangements are in rapid progress for the immediate development of the property on a scale commensurate with its value and extent.

Subscriptions payable at the times of subscribing, or one-half in cash, the balance in thirty days from the date of closing the subscription, can be made in person or by letter at the office of the undersigned, No. 61 Cedar Street, New York; at the office of ROBINSON, No. 4 Broad Street, and JOHN W. SHERMAN'S MARCH THROUGH SOUTH CAROLINA—ROAD AT THE SWAMP CROSSINGS.—SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 133.]

THE OLD SOLDIER'S REWARD.

I saw, beyond the years to be,
An old man bending low
Above a book—a history
Of glory all of woe;
His pale lips moved without a sound,
He neither sighed nor smiled,
And one thin arm was twined around
A sunny, silent child.

Page after page he read and turned,
And many a pause made he,
As if the meaning was inurned
In some dim memory;
For though the deeds he read were wrought
By help of his right hand,
They came as slowly to his thought
As from the spirit land.

"My boy," he said at length, "this page
Must have been writ for me;
I just remember it; an age
Ago it seems to be.
'A sergeant took the flag and ran
A rod before his men:'
My boy, I was that very man;
I see it all again.

"And here: 'The horses all were killed,
And every man but one;
The grape-shot failed; he quickly filled
A gun with pebble stone,
And fired point-blank below the smoke
Into the rebel line,
And thinned it so it turned and broke:'
My boy, that shot was mine.

"Again: 'They rushed through mist and rain
Up to the clear blue sky;
The wounded hushed their groans of pain
As 'twere a joy to die
So near to God?' I lay that night
Beneath the stars that stood
High over Lookout's silent height,
Reflected in my blood.

"And here, and here: I never thought
My deeds would find a pen.
I only for my country fought
Along with other men:
It must have been because I took
No thought of history.
The generous man who wrote this book
Has put down much for me.

"The hills, my boy, are white with snow:
I feel the creeping cold;
I hear another bugle blow
Than that I heard of old.
Is this me; I must go—good-by!
The book has paid for all:"
And then he bowed without a sigh
And answered to the call.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MARCH 4, 1865.

SHERMAN'S TRUE VICTORY.

WHEN GENERAL SHERMAN marched from Atlanta one of the leading rebel papers in Richmond said that even if he pushed through to the coast it was of no importance. He may succeed in traversing the State, it said, but it will be as an army passes through the air, without wounding it or leaving a trace of its passage.

In commenting upon this statement, which was superficially true, we ventured to suggest that the moral consequences of such a success had been entirely overlooked. Has it not proved so? When SHERMAN arrived at Savannah and occupied it, there was not a general concession that the rebellion had received a death-blow? He had not fought a battle upon the way. The march was a agreeable journey. The fields were full. The people did not oppose him. The climate was soft. There was nothing of war but the military array. Yet from the midst of the national flag appeared over Savannah the heart of the rebellion has been broken.

The reason is obvious. If there are two wrestlers, and one suddenly ascertains that two steps behind his opponent is a gnawing gulf, and the opponent learns at the same moment that it is known to his adversary, the contest is virtually over. The combatants seem to stand as erect and sturdy as ever. But the conscious mind of one has relaxed his muscles. His heart is conquered, and his hand succumbs. So the rebellion has maintained a saucy front. "The South" was one man. "The South" was eager to die in the last ditch. "The South" would gladly destroy its homes and property to paralyse the Yankee invader. "The South" might be overrun, but would never be conquered. So long as this was every where believed, it required a factitious strength to the whole movement. It gave it that moral force which is the most powerful of all auxiliaries.

And it is directly at that moral force that SHERMAN'S campaign strikes. His smooth and unresisted march from Atlanta to Savannah, from Savannah to Columbia, undreview the country, Europe, and the rebels themselves. It has shown that they are not one man; that they are not eager for the last ditch; that they will not do to thwart the Yankees what Holland did to thwart France; that they will be overrun and can be conquered. When General LEE speaks of the universal despondency; when JUDAH BENJAMIN says that there is very great danger; when DAVIS and HUNTER seek frantically to fire the Southern heart with a wretched trick; when every rebel paper confesses the universal gloom; and one of them, speaking for all, says, frankly: "The people are not whipped but cowed. Their souls and not their hands are disarmed. Our strength is not sapped, but our courage is oozing out at the ends of our fingers;" and when EARL RUSSELL suddenly discovers that he is not surprised that the Government of the United States is irritated by raids from Canada and sums from English ports; we behold the moral victory of SHERMAN'S campaign: we see that his march was not an arrow harmlessly piercing the air, but a needle forcing the fluid to every vein.

SHERMAN has exposed the mask and the brag of the rebellion. Rebel gascons will boast, but he has taught us the exact value of gasconade. "Let the foe meet resistance unto death!" shouts MEGRATH, the Governor of South Carolina. "SHERMAN will find a lion in his path," says the Richmond Examiner, "BEAUREGARD is in his front." "Long before Columbia falls," says the Columbia Carolinian of February 12, "we look for a battle and a victory commensurate in its consequences with the great interests now at stake, one which will prove that GOD is fighting by our side, although with visor down," and that he has wounded so Carolina the proud privilege of closing as she began this war—in triumph." Five days afterward Columbia was occupied by SHERMAN. The lion BEAUREGARD stole away; and the ludicrous newspaper, which asked "what reason is there to anticipate an immediate advance upon Columbia; we recall none, to believe it is contrary to common sense," had no sooner spoken than SHERMAN arrived.

The wretched blunder of the rebellion is relentlessly ridiculed by General SHERMAN. The same Mobile Register which now says that "the people [the rebels] are not whipped but cowed, their souls and their hands are disarmed," said four years ago: "If the war lasts five years the terms of peace will be dictated at the gates of Boston. But the war will not last so long. The day is not far distant when the North will sue for peace. Until it does the policy as well as the will of the South is to give them war to their hearts' content, war to the knife and to the hilt." "White slaves," said another of these pleasing sheets, "peddling wretches, smallchange knaves and vagrants, the dregs and offscourings of the populace—these are the levied forces whom LINCOLN suddenly arrays as candidates for the honor of being slaughtered by gentlemen such as Mobile sent to battle yesterday. Let them come South and we will put our negroes to the dirty work of killing them. But they will not come South. Such a wretch of them will live on this side of the border longer than it will take us to reach the ground and drive them over." The Richmond Mercury at the same time exclaimed: "The miserable fanatics and charlatans at Washington are pursuing the very course of policy we most earnestly desire them to pursue." The Charleston Mercury now says: "Our paper is suspended with a view to its temporary removal to another point. This is rendered necessary by the progress of military events."

In such a wild yell of contempt for freemen this rebellion against a popular government began. By such passionate appeals and such appeals the mind of the Southern people was inflamed. By such frenzied rhetoric they have been bewildered and stimulated since the first shot was fired. The exposure of this enormous deceit is part of the true victory of SHERMAN. He subdues the mind of the rebellious section by enlightening it. He shows that the South, sedulously kept in ignorance both of the character and spirit of the people of the North by these miserable leaders, will learn first to respect Northern valor and persistence, and then to estimate and esteem Northern intelligence. They will learn that there is no vindictiveness in the Northern heart; that the Union is not fixed immutably and forever, upon Union and Liberty, and they will see that their own happiness as well as the national glory are inseparable from that aim.

CHARLESTON.

THAT Charleston should fall was inevitable. That Charleston should fall without a blow was inconceivable. The South Carolinians have always boasted more of their courage as Americans. The Charlestonians always accounted themselves the most chivalric of Carolinians. That the rebel chiefs will have forged their fallow-citizens into this insurrection mean to leave us without any respect for their own consistency will hardly meet with foolish code? If there were any point of honor whatever in this wretched rebellion it was the defense of the cradle of secession and treason. If there were any possible last ditch it was the streets of Charleston. If we might expect to find any where that passionate and heroic devotion of which we have heard for long years the loud bluster, it was in the city where four years ago men and women of every age crowded balconies, housetops, and windows to watch exulting traitors firing upon the little garrison of Sumter, whose steady endurance typified that of the nation that placed it there.

It was a strange scene on that April day four years ago. The spectators cheered and wept for joy, and the merry bells rang, when the flag of their country fell for the first time, shot down by its own children. Did the spectators of that day remember it when at last that flag returned triumphant? Over how much bitter agony, through what seas of blood, across what blighted hopes and ruined lives it returned; but also over the desolation of Carolinian homes which Carolina has wrought; over the wide waste of fortunes which Carolina has destroyed; over the treacherous doctrine of State supremacy which Carolina has hugged snake-like to her breast; over the relic of slavery which Carolina has shielded. The old flag returns. Peace, union, and prosperity are the benedictions it imparts. Those who see its coming, those who have hated it as the symbol of equal rights and universal justice and popular government, those who have fostered this huge monster of rebellion until, when it turns and rends them, may flout and refuse its blessings. But the people whom they have fooled; the people whom they have kept ignorant, degraded, and prejudiced; the people of whose political rights that flag is the symbol, will gradually hail it as benighted outcasts hail the dawn.

The fall of Charleston can bring no exultation to any loyal citizen. It has been considered, indeed, the special nest of rebellion. It has always been an aristocratic city. Its "society" has been held to be peculiarly aristocratic. It has led Newport and Saratoga by the nose. Its swagger has passed for elegance; its insolence for ease. Men who were not enough redeemed from barbarism to honor men as men, and who with the kings of wild Africa sold human beings for money, have assumed "gentlemen" in Broadway and in the shadow of Bunker Hill. But that illusion is long since dissolved; and the ignoble fall of the little Corinth of their pride merely shows how poor is their manhood who in this day and country despise men, and how contemptible is the "chivalry" that will not die for what it so dearest honor.

We shall hear, perhaps, from Richmond, as we heard when Vicksburg, Atlanta, and Savannah fell, that it is of no consequence; that the rebellion is really stronger without Columbia and Charleston. But if in its chief cities, in its territories, and in its population, we are not to look for "the beginning" where shall we find it? In the gloomy will of DAVIS; in the hollow rhetoric of BENJAMIN; in the sharp shrieks of the rebel press;—where else?

OFFICE-HOLDING.

MR. WILSON has introduced a bill into the United States Senate recommending the preference in appointment to civil office of honorably discharged soldiers and sailors who shall be found competent; and Mr. GILLESPIE has made a similar proposition in the State Senate of New York. The report which accompanies Mr. WILSON'S bill states the prayer of many petitions to be that the tenure of office may be for life or good behavior.

The wisdom of the selection of a special class for preference in the matter of office may be fairly disputed. That any class should be authorized to feel a right to office and a consequent right to demand it in any way easily prove to be a practical misfortune. It seems to us that the true principle in the matter is the recognition of the equal claim of all loyal citizens who are honest and competent. It is hardly to be asserted that all those who have been engaged in active service are more earnestly patriotic than many and many who have not; and the tendency of such discrimination is a kind of jealousy which is always better avoided if possible.

The feeling of respect and sympathy for the soldiers and sailors upon which the proposal springs is genuine and honorable. It is, indeed, universal. The feeling of no nation toward its army and navy ever before when it ours is; and for the plain reason that they are in large part the nation itself volunteering. In every way the tender solicitude of the country has been expressed; it will continue to be so. And this is so sure to be the case that the object of the recommendation or bill would equally be accomplished, while the advantage derived by such an expression by Congress of respect and gratitude to the army and navy is destroyed by the mischief of an expression of Congressional preference for a class. It is precisely one of those things which should be left to the sympathy and good sense of the country. They may be fully trusted. The honorably discharged soldier and sailor is as sure of substantial gratitude as the country is of his substantial service.

The resolutions reported by the Committee of the Senate do not recommend that the tenure of the office should be life or good behavior. But that is a recommendation which we hope to see made in regard to all ministerial offices, and enforced by law. The inconveniences and perils of the national elections would be in large part removed, if every department of the administration were not pulled up by the roots every four years. The utter demoralization springing from our foolish whim of rotation in office is known to every man. The consequence of the system is that the most practical of people renounce their common sense in dealing with the most important affairs. No merchant would think of making a man his book-keeper because he was a clever blacksmith, nor intrust a moments-ous suit at law to a good physician. If a successful trader wishes a captain for his ship, he requires knowledge, seamanship, experience. If a gentleman hires a gardener, he prefers familiarity with plants, hot-houses, and soils. No man would employ a coachman who did not understand how to take charge of horses—and yet the same man would recommend an applicant to a public office who was as unfit for it as a man who only speaks Chinese to teach an infant school in New York.

The money that would be saved to the people; the greater ease and method and punctuality with which the public work would be done; the dangers that would disappear from elections; the deeper and more permanent repose which would be imparted to the national character by a simple reform like this is incalculable.

Nor was there ever a more favorable moment for beginning the change of system than this. The President has been re-elected not by a party but by the country. The ordinary party reasons for the disastrous custom do not exist. The holders of office are as good friends of the policy of the Administration as those who are not. And if the only changes after the 4th of March should be those resulting from resignations, from delinquency, disloyalty, or incapacity, the country would have an additional reason to honor the President and his policy.

"FILL UP THE ARMY."

"HASTEN on recruiting to fill up the army," telegraphs the Secretary of War to governor TOD-TON, "and the rebellion must receive the final blow in this spring's campaign."

This call, with the rebel General LEE'S official avowal of universal despondency, should be enough to give General GRANT the hundred thousand men for whom he asks to overthrow the military forces of the rebellion.

Indeed, to the least sanguine observer the situation can not seem very unpromising. The whole Southwest is paralyzed. SHERMAN is approaching North Carolina to the rear of the excommunication of the rebellion, and LEE can not long remain absolutely inactive in Richmond. The largest force of the national army now is the sure end of the matter. Whoever joins GRANT or SHERMAN helps to secure the speedy and final victory. There must be thousands and thousands of active men who could not go for a long war, but who can go for a campaign which crowns the great work. We are not sure that the present enlistments are never more active. The larger the army the more hopeless will contention with it seem. JUDAH BENJAMIN, the rebel Secretary of State, declares that all the white force of the rebel section is exhausted. There is danger, great danger, he says, unless the slaves are armed.

Why should they not be exhausted? Their very souls are fatigued with treacherous deceit. BENJAMIN and DAVIS, and the rest, who now so desperately fan the expiring flame of ignorant exasperation against the Government, have deluded the people of the Southern States into a war in which they have been every where beaten. Every promise made to them has been broken. Every hope which allured them has been disappointed. Every vision of independence, of recognition, of prosperity, has faded utterly away. Like men drugged with poisoned wine who have been seduced into enlisting, and who have recovered to find themselves wretched, their faculties darkened, and their memory dead, so the people of the Southern States were inflamed with falsehoods against the Government, the Union, and the North, by fellow-citizens, and are now awaking to discover how wantonly they have been deceived, and how terribly they are paying the penalty.

The wonder is that they are released from this thralldom the happier for us all; and the more rapidly the armies are recruited the speedier will be the release. The rebel cause relies, says the Mobile Register, from a poverty of spirit to breast reverses and of fortitude to endure trials. It confesses that all hearts are darkened with gloom. Whose fault is that? Whose act so? That is a question which the rebel chiefs and rebel editors may well tremble to hear asked.

THE SEA-ISLAND ORDER.

THE order of General SHERMAN, setting apart the sea-island and a strip of coast for the freedmen, was sharply criticised until the minutes of the interview between Secretary STANTON, General SHERMAN, and the leaders of the colored men were published, when it was found that the General's order was the result of the best possible counsel.

General BUTLER, in criticising SHERMAN'S order, repeats the well-known remark of FREDERICK DOUGLASS, that the colored men wish merely to be let alone. Mr. DOUGLASS means, of course, that they shall be suffered to take their chance with other people. But certainly one of the best ways of letting them alone, or suffering them to mind their own affairs, is to ascertain what, under certain circumstances, they wish to do—and following their suggestions. The proposition of MR. DOUGLASS is that white citizens shall not impose their whims upon black; and if any of the latter honestly wish to do as the leaders at Savannah said, it is surely no offense in General SHERMAN that he promised them what they wished.

Supreme good sense is always the doing the best thing under the circumstances. Thus the Metropolitan police in the city of New York is not theoretically according to any popular system, which allows every community to take care of its own ordinary police. But no man in his senses would wish to return to the old system. It is an exceptional department for the general law justified by circumstances. Nor is it very difficult to find a similar solution for General SHERMAN'S case.

A man who has shown the remarkable sagacity of SHERMAN may be safely trusted to deal with new subjects. It is clear that he will treat them all practically and not theoretically. His education as an old army officer, and his long residence in the South had undoubtedly made him a specialist of the humane of the colored race, and possibly contemptuous of their capacity. But the moment he was brought in contact with them by the war, he looked at them and their condition exactly as they were. The slaves who followed his army in the march through Georgia were evidently no enemies of his, and his conference with the Savannah leaders, and his subsequent action, show how utterly free he is from any self-seeking or inhuman prejudice. The result of SHERMAN'S conduct in this matter with the dull opacity of M'CLELLAN and HALLECK is as striking as the difference in military genius of these men.

The order is temporary, of course. General SHERMAN has no power, nor would he wish to assume it, of finally separating one part of our population from another. For the present he is the virtual dictator, under the Government of the section in which he is operating. His means are brute force. War, as he says, is cruel. It is auxiliary. But fortunately it is temporary. It is a very unnecessary labor to fall upon his order and rend it as inhuman and antiquated and aiming at an impossible separation. It is a wise expedient, like many of General BUTLER'S acts in New Orleans.

Should Congress finally agree upon a Freedmen's bill, the whole subject will be at once removed from the operation of any military order. And the object of such a bill will be to secure the letting alone of the emancipated slaves by considering the peculiarity of their position and saving them from the interference of white sharpers.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE SITUATION.

February 15.

The military situation could not be more promising. General SHERMAN has accomplished his purpose in South Carolina. Charleston has fallen, and the rebel armies have fallen back on Charlotte, North Carolina. SHERMAN is pressing on in the same direction. Charleston was evacuated on the 18th. The same day Admiral DUPONT took possession. Florence has assumed the attitude of all the rebel armies on the 9th.

Our fleets prevail in all peculiar interest. It is quite certain that both England and France will maintain the attitude of amicable indifference to our civil war.

CONGRESS.

February 15.

In the Senate, Mr. Johnson, of Maryland, announced the death of Senator HICKS from that State. Several unimportant resolutions of respect were passed. At 2 o'clock the surrender of Charleston was brought to the Chamber, and the funeral services of the Masonic Order were performed.

In the House, the customary tribute of respect was paid to Senator HICKS.

February 16:

In the Senate, the Report of General Herman as Inspector of the Defenses of Arkansas was presented. A bill was passed to authorize the settlement of claims of the Arkansas Legislature for the support of troops and the reward Africans in Liberia.

In the House, it was resolved that that body should meet at 11 o'clock A.M., and remain in session till 9 P.M. The Senate bill to increase the mail communication between the United States and Canada was passed by a large majority.

February 17:

In the Senate, Mr. Sapue's credentials as Virginia Senator were presented, and the entire session was taken up in the debate on Senator FOSTER'S reference to the Judiciary Committee.

In the House, the Internal Revenue bill came up, and was amended so as to levy a tax of one half of one per cent. on sales; another amendment was adopted, providing for a very heavy bullion broker shall take out a license for which he shall pay one thousand dollars.

February 18:

In the Senate, the Army Appropriation bill was taken up and amended by striking out the proviso that no money should be paid for the railroads for transportation of troops and munitions of war for the United States. The bill was then passed with an additional appropriation providing for the repeal of all laws and regulations of the War Department giving additional rank or pay to staff or volunteer officers.

In the House, the Internal Revenue bill was passed, with amendments: that no peddler not enrolled shall be licensed; a tax of 25 cents per pound on smoking tobacco; making substitute-brokers pay $150 for a license; imposing a tax of 5 per cent. on the net profits of gross receipts of railroad companies and similar corporations, where the profits are under $3000 per annum, and of 5 per cent. on the excess of the amount. The sanctions to tax wine was non-concurred in. An amendment was concurred in taxing National and State banking associations 10 per cent. on the amount of notes of any State bank or association paid out by them on and after January 1, 1866.

February 20:

In the Senate, the vote on the Army Appropriation bill was reconsidered, and the amendment equalizing the rank and pay of officers and engineers and others was rejected.

In the House, the Conference report on the bill, amendatory of the existing law and emoluments of army officers, was disagreed to, and a new conference asked.

In the Senate, Mr. Sumner, Chairman of Foreign Affairs, declining to furnish a copy of General Meagher's report relative to the evacuation of Cumberland Gap. The House then proceeded to the consideration of the bill providing a Government for the States subverted or overthrown by the rebellion. In the midst of the debate on this bill, General Grant's dispatch, announcing the evacuation of Charleston, was received with great applause.

February 21:

In the Senate, no important business was done.

In the House, the bill providing a government for States overthrown or subverted by rebellion took on the table, 91 to 83.

THE FALL OF CHARLESTON.

An official dispatch from General Gillmore states that Charleston fell into our possession on the morning of the 18th inst., with over two hundred pieces of artillery. In other accounts says that all the guns were spiked, and a large quantity of ammunition destroyed. Evacuation had been evacuated during the previous night by the rebel forces, the Mayor surrendering the city to the troops of General Schimmelfenig, who at once took possession. The rebels evacuated Sumter, Moultrie, Gregg, Wagner, Cummings Point, and bridges, two iron-clads, and several vessels in the harbor. They were burned by the rebels. The Arsenal building contained 200 kegs of powder, which exploded with terrific effect, killing and wounding upward of one hundred people. It is supposed that 6000 bales of cotton were consumed in the conflagration. The dwelling-houses in the lower part of the city were found to be completely riddled by our shells, and only a small part of the population had deserted the city, and the poor who remained were suffering for want of food. The Stars and Stripes were raised over Fort Sumter by Captain H. M. Bruce.

NEWS ITEM.

A Cincinnati paper states that out of nineteen hundred rebel prisoners at Camp Chase, Columbus, only about one-fourth are willing to be exchanged. The remainder want to take the oath of allegiance and remain at the North.

FOREIGN NEWS.

Both in England and France the news of the fall of Fort Fisher produced a very positive effect upon public opinion. The Paris Constitutionnel says that the occupation of the Isle of Hoaust, off the coast of France, on the 15th of January. She had been previously supplied by French vessels, and consequently, the Paris journal says, could not, the other necessaries of an outfit. It was reported that she was bound for Charleston, for the purpose of raising the blockade. If this was really her destination she probably found a change in the aspect of affairs on the arrival of the vessels in that vicinity. The latest reports say that the Isle of Hoaust has been sold to Spain, and that she is in unseaworthy condition.

The Paris Press comments at length upon the disposition shown by our House of Representatives in applying the term recognition to the Bill for a Diplomatic Appropriation bill. There seems to be an appreciation among the people of the European press that the South will hasten on a crisis between America and Europe. The Gazette de France says that the Imperial Government has not taken a more determined attitude in relation to Mexican affairs, but that the Mexican question has done the best he could, and threw blame upon the rest of Europe for causing Europe to be in a false position. The story about the cession of Durango, Sonora, and other States to MAXIMILIAN is denied by the Mexican Minister at Paris. On the 4th instant there was a meeting of the Privy Council at Paris. It was understood that the Emperor Napoleon, who is favorable to the Union, is now Vice-President of the Council. The object of the meeting was the question to FRANCE were the chief object of the meetings. The discussion terminated in the following:

"That for the moment it would be wrong to give way to exaggerated hopes, and that it would be well to have a conciliatory assurance which American diplomacy continued to give to the Cabinet, and to adapt its action provisionally from all movement, without, however, indulging in a false security."

The British Parliament was opened on the 6th. The Lord Chancellor read the Queen's Speech. The dissolution of the Danish war was briefly alluded to. Her Majesty remained carefully neutral during the whole of the late parties in the American civil war. The opening of the Danish Sea to all flags had affected largely the trade commerce. The conduct with the New Zealand tribes was not to be terminated. Her Majesty had been invited to be at the meeting of a conference of delegates from her several British American provinces, which was appointed by Her Majesty's Governor-General, assembled at Quebec. Those delegates had unanimously agreed upon a plan for the closer union of those provinces under a central government. HOW SOLDIER GOODS TRAVEL IN ENGLAND.—Considerable ingenuity is displayed by the thieves in conveying their unlawful possessions from one place to another. Hampers, clothes-baskets, hat-boxes, carpet-bags, and brown paper parcels, are favorite modes. Articles are carried by women dressed like servants, and by honest and unsuspected servants and boys, and parties who frequently have no knowledge of the contents of the luggage. Thieves even have been known regularly to invite a friend to dine, and travel along the streets and railways in company with a basket containing the stolen property. Two or three pounds of cheese or butter, insert therein a gold watch or a diamond ring, place the eatable upon a plate, and the savory commodity is safely carried among the police, without having excited any notice, whereas if any person or desire concerning the cheese may be that it would make a nice pudding for his family. Jewelry of the most worthy of jewelry have travelled the whole length of a railway clothed up in a salmon or a ham. Dresses, cloaks, and shawls, once obtained, in the provinces, a large quantity of which, and disposed of to a receiver of stolen goods, or to the force-master in London. They purchased a very large Bible once, scooped out the inside, filled it with valuables, and then sent it off per goods train like any other package.

A MODEST MAN.—The Rev. Mr. Burnham, of Winchester, Connecticut, recently officiated in the army as a private, and was sent to the rendezvous at New Haven. On the Sunday after his arrival he was summoned before the commanding officer of the post and addressed: "Mr. Burnham, I see by the records in the list sent to me that you are a reverend. About a dozen reverends have enlisted from this State, and I wish you to preach for the soldiers' night without asking for a chaplaincy; so I guess we'll make you chaplain." And he was made chaplain accordingly.

VALUABLE PREY.—A peasant in the environs of Kenigsgrid (Bohemia) a few days since found a hare, which had been caught in a snare, and carried it home, where it soon recovered from its painful situation and became the pet of his children. It was extremely tame, and allowed itself to be caressed by all. In

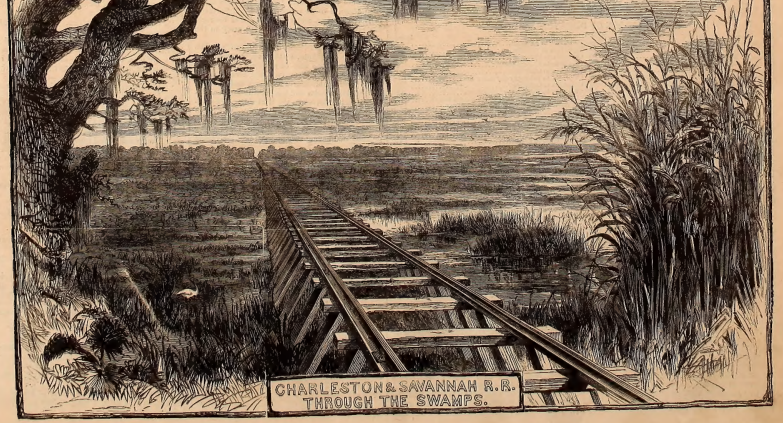
THE WAR IN THE CAROLINAS.



GENERAL SHERMAN'S campaign, as it has been developed thus far, appears not to have been a series of battles but one of difficult marches. The pleasant promenade across the State of Georgia was not repeated in South Carolina. A wide region of swampy country had to be traversed before our armies could emerge upon the sandy tract of the uplands. An idea of the difficulties which beset SHERMAN in the first stage of his South Carolina campaign is conveyed in the illustration on our first page and on page 137. These swamp crossings, made doubly intricate by trees which have been felled by the enemy, and where our advance is not unfrequently harassed by rebel skirmishers, occurred every few miles in the earlier stage of the march. In the march from M'Phersonville the water was up to the horses' girths.

As in the advance on Savannah, so in this march northward from that point SHERMAN'S movements appear to be hidden alike from the enemy's scrutiny and our own. At Richmond or at Washington there is the same ignorance of details. It is known that there are so many columns, that certain points have been reached, that in every direction KILPATRICK'S cavalry are meddling with the rebel lines of communication, but all else is in obscurity.

SLOCUM'S column, which is still the left wing, began to move, January 27, toward Sister's Ferry, which is seventy miles above Savannah. The greater part of the column and all its trains were obliged to move up the Georgia bank of the river to avoid the impassable swamps on the other side. The gun-boat Pontiac covered the crossing at Sister's Ferry. The height of water in the river produced by the late freshet made Sister's Ferry a very good temporary base for SLOCUM, and the light transports at Savannah were brought into requisition for the conveyance of supplies. We give on this page an illustration of the Pontiac guarding two of these transports, the Neuskon and Fountain, down the river. The scene on board these boats must have been very picturesque, as the bold shore was completely submerged and the vessels appeared to be forcing a passage through the trees and underbrush of the forest itself.

The Fourteenth and Twentieth Corps of SLOCUM'S column reached Sister's Ferry January 20. After crossing the river this column occupied Robertsville. Branchville and Augusta were thus both threatened at the same time, and the enemy was divided for the defense of both. While KILPATRICK threatened Augusta, SLOCUM crossed Whippy Swamp and the eastern branches of the Combahee River, moving on Branchville.

HOWARD at the same time moved from Pocotaligo on the Savannah and Charleston Railroad. On this page we give an illustration of this railroad, which conveys an idea of the nature of the country which it traverses. HOWARD moved against the enemy's line nearer the coast on the lower Combahee; and while SLOCUM crossed the Edisto west of Branchville to Orangeburg on the road to Columbia, HOWARD with the Fifteenth and Seventeenth Corps isolated the rebel position on the south side. We illustrate on page 136 the burning of M'Phersonville by our forces. This place was five miles west of Pocotaligo.

A dispatch from the rebel General WHEELER, dated the 7th, claims to have driven back a portion of KILPATRICK'S cavalry.

In the mean time General GILLMORE superseded General FOSTER in the command of the army operating directly against Charleston. Our forces gained a foothold on Little Britain, an island at the upper end of the North Edisto. On the 10th a force from two to four thousand strong landed at Grimball's, on James Island, in Charleston Harbor, about two miles west of the city. On the 18th Charleston was evacuated by General HARDEE, and Admiral DAHLGREN took possession. In this connection the illustration of Fort Sumter, which we have engraved on pages 136 and 137, possesses great interest. The fort, which has been transformed into an earth-work, and is much more formidable than at the beginning of the war, is now in our possession. The old Union flag again waves over the fort. It was raised at 9 A.M. on the 18th. In the mean while the city of Charleston was in flames. As WHEELER'S cavalry had plundered Columbia before leaving it, so the rebel officers, regardless of all motives of humanity toward the thousands of helpless citizens they were about to leave behind them in Charleston, had, previous to their evacuation, prepared for the destruction of the city. The first explosion took place at 3 o'clock in the morning. Simultaneously with the explosion flames broke out in different parts of the city. While the unfortunate citizens were trying to extinguish the flames, a second explosion took place, causing a terrible loss of life. Our forces took possession at about 6 A.M. The citizens were frantic with horror at the loss of their homes and the mutilation of their friends. Our brave soldiers did their best to arrest the progress of the flames, but it is estimated that two-thirds of the city must have been destroyed. A great amount of artillery was captured with the city.

On the 17th SHERMAN took possession of Columbia, the capital of South Carolina, situated upon the Santee River. The movement of the left wing on Orangeburg compelled BEAUREGARD to fall back on Columbia. He has now withdrawn toward Charlotte, in North Carolina. SHERMAN has advanced in the same direction. We give on page 140 a map of Columbia.

While SHERMAN is making such rapid progress in South Carolina our armies are not standing idle in the old North State. General SCHOFIELD has been assigned to the command of the Department of North Carolina, and a good portion of his corps has united with TERRY'S victorious army in the operations against Wilmington.

TERRY made an advance on the 11th with AMES'S and PAINE'S divisions, moving up the peninsula. Admiral PORTER'S fleet co-operated. The Montgomery and Quaker City covered the advance of the army. The double-enders Mackinaw and Unadilla, the gun-boat Forest and the Monitor Mantauk engaged Fort Anderson on the west side. We illustrate this bombardment on page 140. Our correspondent says that the object of the action was to ascertain the strength of the work and the number of guns, and having accomplished this the vessels withdrew.

AT A VENTURE.

STEAM was up, the train was off, and Tom Graham in it en route for Chattanooga; fairly in stream, as it were, and knowing no more what was to happen next than you do, only bobbing about in the tide of events and looking out sharp to see if Fortune was going to toss you a life-preserver, or if her ladyship intended to let him drown.

Beside him sat a lady, the only one in the car-ten years older than himself—that is, thirty-five—with an audacious turned-up nose, sarcastic lips, a square, determined chin, once determined for a wonderful brilliant brown eyes, and an abundance of hair, thickly sown with gray; not pretty, but not a nonentity. Many a nonentity contrives to have a mouth, nose, and eyes without as much expression as went to the making of her back. Moreover, she had met Graham on his entrance with one of those flitting, scanning glances with which women take their mental measures; and at sight of his uniform, and the M. S. on his cap, there had been a sudden dropping of the lashes, a darkening quicker than a cloud-flitting, too slight indeed for thought, had any one been aware of it, but drowning to catch at straws.

As the train jogged on they fell into conversation—about the war, of course—and, not to put too fine a point on it, they talked "bosh," but with the caution of people sounding boggy ground before stepping on it, you heard the tapping of the sticks all the way; and after a little of the customary vituperation concerning the Yankees each turned and searched the other's face. Steady blue eyes looking keenly into bright brown ones, for an honest hate rings out as heartily as an honest love, and theirs sounded but hollowly; but neither could get behind the other's eyes; and the talk veered about to Northern journals and their account of themselves; and here the cool, watchful lady warmed space, and at last flamed out at the "Northern dolls, whom she would like to lecture if she were only a Mrs. Adams or a Martha Washington, and cared about them, which she didn't; and she would tell them that Southern women turned their diamonds into gun-boats, and robbed the very doors and kitchens of their houses to make arms; and how the Yankee ladies could let their soldiers go hungry through their great cities, and their families—"

"But don't you see all this is so much the better for us?" cut in Graham, ice on the surface, but hugging himself mentally. And the retort brought her fire, as he had anticipated; for the indignant little hypocrite, professing rebel sentiments, quite forgot herself, and bestowed on the rebel officer advancing rebel sentiments a look of genuine "Union" warmth, blushed the next instant over her mistake, and, grown suddenly conciliatory and pussy-cattish, switched off the conversation on another track; to which Tom offered no objection, but believed all the more firmly in the honesty of that one unguarded look.

"I see you are in the service. You volunteered, I presume," said the lady.

"Volunteered," repeated Tom, with a singular intonation. "Well, you can call it so. I entered the army on a conviction of—bayonets crossed at the door—as my lady way of getting out of the provost marshal's office."

"Ah!" his companion had opened her lips to say more, but seemed unable or afraid to get out the words. She was startled entirely out of her high-bred repose; her quiet hands twitched nervously, the color came and went uneasily; and all the while sat Tom, not tense and self-controlled, but as if self-control were not needed; muscles lax in his easy indifference to pose; eyes cool, bright, and resting carelessly on things nearest him; not the quiver of an eyelash to tell how high leaped his heart, or how low it sank, as he said to himself,

"Tom, old boy, if that woman's face is a lie you have your pass to 'kingdom come.'"

The lady drew a long breath.

"Apparently, Sir, you are in the Medical Department."

"Yes. Surgeon at —— hospital."

The dash represents the mumble which Graham substituted for the name.

"And were the people of ——" (with a ludicrous imitation of the mumble) "patriotic?"

"Patriotic; say about boiling-point. The hospital was a sort of Levite among them, and got its dues not only of corn, wine, and oil, but of fruit, fowl, and fine linen; and the girls there had an excellent habit of being pretty and visiting the wards in person"

"Yo were in clover then?"

"Exactly."

"I could understand scrambling out of a thistle bed," remarked the lady, with an affectation of being puzzled, "but considering the scarcity of the other growth along life's highway, it is odd that you were willing to leave it."

"Ah, madam, I appreciate clover as keenly as you do, but the calls of business have no respect for clover."

"Business!" she repeated, and suddenly, as only a woman knows how, melted from reserve and suspicion into candor and pity. "I see you will not trust me; well, I dare trust you. I am for the Union, and I believe in my heart that you are also, and that your 'business' is simply running away from a detested service; and if you are a wolf in sheep's clothing after all—"

"I am not," he said, hastily; and then, as if half ashamed of his warmth, "though it is just possible that I may be the ass in the lion's skin."

"You have cast that point. I will trust! I am right in my conjecture. I can hardly understand why you are going to Chattanooga. Do you know that it is filled with soldiers? is in fact a great military camp, and that so near the Federal lines you can have no hope of protection, I suppose beyond ?" as he running from the cat heading into the trap.

"True; but on the probability of a wire bent or broken out. I know it is but the shadow of the ghost of a chance; but it is the first time I have found even that."

"Shadow indeed, my dear Sir, if you go to a hotel; but you must not go to one. You will be questioned and suspected at once. You must let me help you, and come home with me. We live very quietly, my younger sister and I. My father is dead; my mother is always confined to her room."

Cork jackets to be thankfully received and no questions asked, said Tom to himself, remembering his thoughts on starving, and accepted the invitation; but then both fell off into silence. The color that had crept into the lady's cold cheek burned and deepened for an instant as the thought, "Poor girl, her heart she would have been more at ease in playing the Good Samaritan to something grayer and grimmer than this handsome young officer," flashed, was pondering, as he had the frankness to tell her when she questioned him a moment after, "the case of one that, weary cried, 'Come in, and' as she then drove a thundering big rail through the poor fellow's temples."

"You are no physiognomist," returned the lady, laughing, "or you would see that my nose shuts me out at once from that role. How could one conspire with a sad retreat? You would see, literally spy the hammer and nails in my pocket. Moreover, my name is not Jael, but Mary—Mary Arden."

"Miss Arden," Mr. Mahon at your service," responded Tom, as if going through with an introduction.

Miss Arden smiled, but instantly sobered again, as if mirth jarred on her humor. The train jolted wearily along, the dull afternoon gathering itself, wearing itself out into twilight. It was dark when "Chattanooga" sounded hoarsely through the cars.

Miss Arden had spoken of a "quiet home," and Graham saw it in vision: an old house slumbering somewhere in the suburbs of Chattanooga, dimly lighted, faintly echoing slippered footsteps of that soft, gliding, low-voiced, younger sister, whom she had called Anne. Miss Arden's mother, a bed-ridden old, half-crazy, bitter woman, who had been a slave-holder, and was, it was likely, the most imposing building of Chattanooga. A broad flight of steps, leading from the lower windows, flooding the gravel walks, and tipping and reddening dark masses of shrubbery and great tree boles. He saw it all, and them with laughter and music, as well as the scent of roses; and in the drawing-room was not only the sparkle of mirror and gleam of vase and cornice, but sparkle and gleam of epaulet and sword hilt also—Lieut. Colonel, Captain, and the Commander in full uniform. Graham saw, but too late to draw back. He was in full view of the drawing-room and the mirrors, with its gorgeous gilt cornice, and no forward looked like sure destruction in the longrun; to go back was destruction. Hot heart bounded up in the instant to resolve to all but death, his brain counseled coolly, "Wait till worst comes." Turning on Miss Arden he grated a single fierce whisper in her ear, "Lead!" She pressed on, and—there was no time for more—and led him into the drawing-room.

"My cousin, Dr. Graham; Colonel Lightwood, Captain Allen, Lieutenant Sparke, Lieutenant Ranger. Allen, he has grown almost out of recollection; and how quite forgotten Graham was, I see."

Graham bowed, grimly. The Colonel, the Captain, and the two Lieutenants returned the salutation with severe politeness, as due to strangers and gentlemen, but, as suitors of Mistress Alice there by the window, in a state of disapprobation of male cousins on general principles. Mistress Alice herself hesitated an instant, her eyes on her sister, not the new-comer, and Tom recalled the portrait of a pallid, willowy, sighing Alice. This Alice was a flattered, softened, glowing copy of her sister; glowing not in color, which had hardly an equal in nature, a delicate sea-shell in her cheek—but with that sort of freshness that you find in some white roses fainting tinted, and on the broad leaves of the most correct as Miss Arden herself, but rounded where she was angular; eyes softer; hair as abundant, but of the loveliest brown; nose only pointed enough, curving into a very handsome throat; and a little hand that rested on Tom's like a floating flower leaf or the touch of a bit of soft white fur.

"Dear Tom," she said, her eyes sparkling with a mischief that only could appreciate, "I find I have forgotten you indeed. I should never have known you. I used to think, you know—I can tell you now—that you are so improved—that you were, just a little—gawky."

"And I," retorted Tom, kissing her, "used to think you were just a little, you know, charming, and it seems you are not well over it yet."

The Colonel, the Captain, and the two Lieutenants sat aghast. Miss Arden turned away and began discussing Reubens, as the first seizable subject, with an occasional cough from time to time that sounded as if it had a violent inclination to become a giggle; and Tom, forgetting the danger in the fun, led his cousin (?) to a seat to talk over "old times." Alice was scarlet with anger and mortification. She would have liked to cry, to box his ears, to tell him that he was ungentlemanly, to sweep majestically from the room, and she dared do none of these things, because wholly ignorant of what might be her sister's interest in the impertinent stranger. If he would have looked repentant, or abashed, by her evident displeasure; but it was only too clear that, despite an evident danger, he was keenly enjoying the situation. He had placed her in the shadow of the recessed window, and, seated himself in the full light, was zealously enacting the part of affectionate excavator of fossil remembrances, invented of course, something in this wise:

"Aunt Rutleigh, Alice, what has become of her? Do you remember how we used to go there as children eighteen years ago or more? The old Rutlege land is bought, I believe, but persisted in calling me Sir Scent d'Urce."

"I could hardly have a very vivid recollection of events eighteen years ago, my dear cousin, Alice, "I am not eighteen years old till next month."

"Ah!" responded Tom, not in the least disconcerted, and went off in a manner incomprehensible, among aunts and uncles and cousins, till he came finally to Alice's mother; "why had she not written? He was always fond of Aunt Alice, and felt the slight keenly."

"Yes; mamma was speaking of you only this morning; let us go to her now. She is generally awake at this hour," cried Alice, in utter desperation, pulling rather than leading Tom from the room; and thankful to be relieved from the sight of him.

"Do you mean to ruin yourself, whoever you may be?" she said, angrily. "My mother write to you! She has paralysis; and her name is Judith, not Alice."

"I think it should be yours also," retorted the incorrigible Tom, "for I am sure you will have my hand in a handful of your ringlets."

For all reply the indignant girl turned her back squarely on him, seating herself in the most distant corner of the room, and, with averted head, gazed at window, while Tom established himself at a table with a book. So Miss Arden found them, when at last the Colonel and his satellites were good enough to go.

"You called me Jael," she said to him directly; "but I have done nothing wrong, unless I have blundered. To save you the publicity of the Crutchfield House I have brought you to the notice of four prominent officers. They have no other suspicion here. Every one is suspected, as is quite natural where they are trying to stick a Government and people both to the disintegrating principle. You are a stranger, and doubly suspicious in that character with the Union men; and that Colonel Lightwood, unlike the majority of his sex, has eyes and ears and uses them. Alice, you must have seen—"

"I saw nothing," cat in that young lady, sharply.

"My dear—"

"Really, Mollie, I don't think you can well expect any thing further of me in this gentleman's behalf. It is enough that in love for you I did not resent his audacity in the manner that would have been well and speedily avenged. There is no further need of feigning; and as for my advice, I am not sufficiently interested to give it."

"Would it not be more just in Miss Arden to remember that it is the desperation of my position that forces upon me such disagreeable and, I fear, necessities?" retorted Tom, with great affectation of meekness.

At that Miss Arden sat down and laughed till she cried; but Alice, whose poor little heart had filled to overflowing in that long sitting by the window, could not keep her displeasure forever with tears, and that brought out what Tom had called "the better part of him," as it was inclined to think was the better part of him, at once.

"Miss Arden," he said, earnestly, "you can not believe for an instant that I can feel any thing but respect and admiration for you. You had the generosity to lose a very natural resentment in favor for the safety of an utter stranger. There are few, I believe, who would not have listened to pique, and given me, as I deserved, into the hands of my enemies; and remember, I beg of you, that I considered my offense necessary as a part of my disguise. I always kiss my cousins at home, and I'll sue Adolphus—I mean Alice's pardon for the fault, but yours. It must have been the same if you had had a red nose and cork-screw curls. I looked on abstraction—an imaginary cousin, not a very pretty—"

The sentence remained unfinished, but peace was concluded.

Early morning found Miss Arden at her breakfast-table looking anxiously across the coffee-urn at the stranger.

"I have been reviewing the situation," she said. "In fact I did little else all night. We are our sisters house in a little village, unknown and unsuspected like. Alice is pretty, and we have good society, the Federal officers, in place of impressing, visit us, and have an agreeable and entertaining time. I have a cousin in the Confederate service, unknown in the most violent Union circles, and Colonel Lightwood will make quiet mention of Miss Arden's cousin, and how long before somebody will perk up his head, Graham? Why, you know, you look well—Will Stanley, and left him only two days back in Montgomery, where he is fast enough—up to his ears in business." Nothing could be more than bringing you here, unless it were to keep you. We must have you out of Chattanooga this very day."

"To that last clause Anne with all my heart," said Tom; "but you must allow me to get myself out. I see no reason for involving you in the risk."

"But indeed you are not to deny me. We can not fall into the ranks and fight for our country. This is our only way of serving her, and we who risk and lose all things for her sake love her better than those who simply bear of a war. More than that, you can hardly help yourself out. You can not leave Chattanooga in that uniform; you would never be permitted to pass the lines. You must procure a disguise without attracting attention, and attention, as I have told you, means here suspicion."

"I understand then, madam, that you and Miss Alice here are to charge sword in hand at the opposing rebels, and that when you have been a hare over their dead bodies, that I am to close my eyes, put my fingers in my ears, and 'head for the 'open,' never stopping till I run on the Union lines."

"On the contrary, I and 'Miss Alice here' are to dress you out as our grandmother, or, to speak more literally, as the aunt of Jake Buttergood—an honest Union farmer who supplies us with what he is pleased to style 'truck;' and the said farmer is to put you through in his wagon, and convey you with the reverence due his aunt and your years to the nearest ferry, from whence you will make your way to the Union lines. Why do you shake your head? You surely are not too proud to take your liberty at such a price as a woman? Better a man than of some slave, your only other helper. Making your own way out is very magnificent, no doubt, but the days of gallantry past, and you owe your life to your country; you have no right to throw it away."

And of course she carried the question; and Tom, having yielded the great point, did not show slight on the details. Atropos, otherwise Alice, demanded the sacrifice of his mustache. Tom hinted that old ladies occasionally sported something of the sort. She fired at once. "Not such ugly ones, Sir." Then it was discovered that Jake Buttergood was three in the morning piecing together two old calico gowns and a couple of quilts, because over his long legs a shawl could be pulled in, came considerably short of the floor. They stuffed him back and front with the bedding pillows, a pillow-case, several pairs of stockings, a towel, and a flannel petticoat, and brought his waist well up under his arms; they got his hands down to the cuffs on Alice's collar himself enough for a main-shall, included his eyebrows, painted wrinkles on his cheeks, put patches of courtplaster over his mustache, shorned the closely-cropped head with their mother's wig, tied on over that a frilled night-cap, and above that a huge bonnet and veil, and pronounced the mass in a chair, that concealed the gown piecing, and pronounced him ready—ready, but Miss Arden was not; something had to be done for her, she said.

"God bless you!" she said at last. "The Lord Almighty have you in keeping, and bring you safe to your people, and the day when we will love. Oh, God keep you! He will keep you; and if there comes to you any great peril take heart, for Alice and I will be praying for you, and God hears the prayers of those who trust in him."

Jake Buttergood and his wagon were at the door.

"Be careful, dear aunt, Jake," said Miss Arden as he helped Tom into the wagon; "and Mrs. Buttergood, I can not recommend you, in addition of your years, not to bounce into wagons like a young kid;" for Tom had cleared the wheel at a single step, to the great astonishment of Colonel Lightwood, who, most inopportunely passing, had halted and was curiously taking notes.

"Good-by, Alice," he said. "Look well to yourself, Mrs. Buttergood, and don't omit sending the yarn you prom—"

The words were drowned in the clatter of the crazy vehicle, as the gaunt, lean-ribbed horses started off on a thundering gallop, which soon subsided, however, into the most ordinary pace of two miles an hour. The farm utensils on the wagon-bottom clattered and banged together, the various buckets and bundles rolled about uneasily. Tom, in his place, nearly double on his seat, seemed taking a nap. Mrs. Buttergood's bonnet-veil heaved a little sigh (for he was somewhat sore at heart when he thought of the two women whom he had left behind him), and wore about the middle of the second mile Tom and the woman's gear, that ripped and split at every move. At last they found themselves fairly out of the crowd of the main road, and with the open country lying free before them.

"I reckon," said Jake, laying on the whip, "we enough so we can get on now. Get up, Jake his 'mazin' to git a right smart chance o' stums atween us and that yer sceesh Council. I kan't say I jes liked the sight of his eye."

"That is unfortunate; for here he comes now," answered Tom, coolly, pointing toward the tall figure of the Colonel, and advancing leisurely toward them from the open country. "He has headed us off."

"That's so," muttered Jake. "He has piked it yere on thet ar chunk o a mar' bukletewhit. Ye kin bet high his nose's struck scent, the durned old cusses usually do. What is he?"

Meanwhile Colonel Lightwood came leisurely toward the wagon, evidently with the intention of inspecting it, yet halting at the horses rather than its occupants.

"Good animals these," he said, stroking them on the neck. "I am looking out for a team myself; what will you take for them, farmer?"

"Kurn't say as I has made up my mind to sell," answered Buttergood, sullenly. "I'se raised 'em with my own han's, and I sets dreffil high on 'em; besides, I'm goin' fer my satisfaction to the ferry, and I allow thet the marsh hev ter tote me the rest ur my days."

Colonel Lightwood walked suddenly to the other side of the wagon.

"What is your opinion, aunty?" he asked of Tom. "Why, you must be strangling behind that veil. Here! have a little of the fresh air," throwing back the veil, and peering close under the bonnet. "Aha! no need of a surgeon! I perceive that he old should have slipped, as naturally I have leaving Tom's breast in full view; for any evil eye, and a broad daylight, could have seen through wrinkles painted on a full firm face, and a frilled cap that overshadowed one bright eye, meeting the Colonel with steady masculine defiance.

With a sudden move the Colonel untied Mrs. Buttergood's bonnet, saying, with mock politeness:

"Excuse me, madam, but I fancy that I should know you better without this hat; and the cap you will allow me to remove—ah! you have cut your hair!—very unbecoming—there now! you look vastly better, and I find I am quite right. I have an excellent memory for faces, Dr. Graham, and I take strong and sudden likings. I can't part with you on such short acquaintance. I must ask you to accompany me to Chattanooga."

During this harangue and the preliminary disrobing Tom had sat quiet, hardly stirring an eyelash, to the huge disgust of Jake, who sat there muttering, "Durn 'em! wull he set thar like a sheep?" But as the Colonel, who should have known better, looking into those large, steadfast eyes, emphasized his demand by laying his hand on Tom's wrist, he swung his right arm suddenly free of the cloak, and before Lightwood could draw back, or even call out, dealt him a blow with the butt end of his revolver that laid him on the ground, to all appearance dead.

"That's the 'tork," shouted Buttergood; "ye ar a trump, ye ar, after all. And now, I reckon, the sooner we're rid off the 'tork. That 'ere has the hull kuntry arter us soon as he kin crawl, ye'd better b'lieve."

Tom looked at the horses doubtfully; a distracted gallop of three minutes, dying off continually into a crawl, was not the most effective way of "moseyin" to advantage certainly. Still, as Jake remarked, "even a wurrumill get thar of ye oo'y gev him time enuf," and toward the close of the day they came in sight of the dark and sullen river, the dilapidated house of the ferryman, and the old flat, that was the means of crossing, moored near it. Buttergood went to find the ferryman, and came back with him in tow, but looking crest-fallen.

The ferryman positively refused the ferry.

"Orders is to ferry no one, not a durn one, and that one of I do. I ain't such a disgustion-borned fool to carry my durned, unlikely, white-livered traitor to the Yanks, and pull hemp for it. When I stretch my neck it will be for somethin' a powerful sight better'n that, ye kin bet."

"You prefer shooting to neck-stretching, eh?" asked Tom.

"What—what's thet?" stammered the ferryman, a little staggered by this old lady, who broke in on the conversation in a deep bass voice.

"I say, my friend," repeated Tom, stripping off his disguise, "that the men who gave you those orders can't possibly be here before next week—time enough to run; but unless you listen to reason I will shoot you now where you stand, as there is a God in heaven I will. We are not two, We are not anxious to kill you. On the contrary, here is a sort of currency that I fancy you haven't seen for years," producing a couple of gold pieces, "and you shall be paid for the job. But we mean to cross this afternoon," tapping his revolver with a significant click between the words.

So the coward bound, seeing no alternative, undermed the flat, and with Jake's help got it out in work; and Graham, standing on the side nearest the opposite shore, drank in the air as if it were liberty.

"Ye kin say yer tun hum now," said Jake, who had been watching him with evident sympathy. "When ye git back tell the gals I'm well, and pike hit plumb east till ye make a housen in a deadnin'. That's Tim Burke's house. Tell him I sent ye. He'll forward ye as keerful as if ye was glass sent by mail. And if it wasn't fur the fambly, or I war a leetle younger, ye shouldn't trail by yer self."

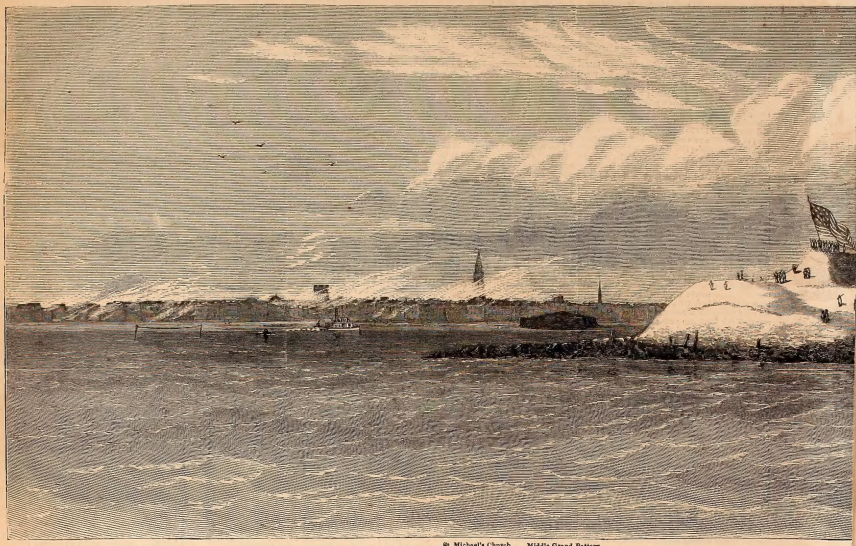
Graham shook him heartily by the hand.

"No need of saying good-by, farmer. I am coming back—in another uniform."

"That's the 'tork; and Cornel, ef ye git a chance, guv the rebs a leetle brimston' for me, will ye?"

Graham did come back, and in the Federal uniform, as he promised, within the two letters found their way to Alice Arden, signed T. C. In home letters from that young gentleman we find him mentioned incidentally "that the friends the Ardens have left Chattanooga and removed to Nashville;" and later on, after the occupation of that city by our forces, we find the marriage solemnized of the whole matter in a newspaper mention of the marriage of a Miss Arden with Captain Thomas Graham, U. S., one of our most efficient officers.

THE POOR WOMAN.



IF sneers! is sneers! and yonder, at God's porch.
Upon her knees, a woman old doth pray!
Unlike things, they range the measure still of death
It is for bread she prayeth, day by day.
Praying alms through the streets, unheeding rich.
Winter and summer season cometh she
Her worsted shawl is blind. O Future hand!
Let us bestow on her our charity!

Remember ye what this old wretch has been,
With her quick cheeks in rosiness and so white?
Once was she of our theatre the queen,
Her songs the town's delight and midnight.
Yet young, amid their laughter and their tears,
Of her good beauty was a loveliness,
And all their charmed dreams reflected here
The beauty of her face and dress.

How many times, along the homeward street,
Her shadowed speed could scarce outrun it e'rowed;
Above the clatter of her horses' feet
She heard the lover's whisper in her hood.
To hand her from her carriage to her door,
To bind her every gave vantageously,
How many rivals watch'd her steps before!—
Let us bestow on her our charity!

When all the Arts were wreathing crowns for her
How full of pomp was her high dwelling-place!
How many revelries were begot and born!
As loving tribute brought, her love to grace!
Her many partakers, all her guests,
Quaff'd the cup of her prosperity!
Our palates have all had their revelries!
Let us bestow on her our charity!

Oh sad reversal! as times here be hurl'd!
Alas! how much velds, and dimm'th her beauty's sheen!
And soon, alone and poor, she hugged her brood,
Where by the door in every years her place hath been.
No hand knew better than her hand to din
Under so many life of her poor heart
Is able yet to feed on pity,
That her last trust in likeness may not depart,
Let us bestow on her our charity!

ASLEEP.

He lay beside the bivouac fire
While slowly waned the troubled night
Which nearer brought to us the dire
Dark hours of one Virginia fight.
I could not sleep; and so the while
He slept and dreamed I watched his face,
And nearer stepped, as once a smile
Caress'd it with its fond embrace.

His lips moved gently, and betrayed
A name, the name Christ's mother bore;
And then, as if in dreams afraid
To tell his secret, spoke no more.
Slowly his sense unclosed; and when
He saw me by him, blushes came
To light his boyish features; then
I smiled, and spoke the whispered name.

"You heard me, Sir?" Half shy, he seemed Wishing, reluctant still, to tell
What of his Mary he had dreamed,
How he had loved her long and well.
The old, long story, told as pain
As sorrow, life, and death can be:
For well we know Love's lightest chain
Wears often sadly, wearily.

He guessed my thought: "'t did not mean,"
He said, with whisper aught of her:
But in my vision I have seen
(Or seemed to see) the spots that were
Our cruelty's record to slain.
Her hand in mine, to faintly call
'Dear Mary!' and at last to break
My long reserve and tell her all.

"Waking or sleeping, night and day,
Her sad, sweet face seems always near.
I see it in the battle's fray,
And through the tumult still I hear
The tremulous music of her tone—
Nay, sometimes almost think I press
Her hand again, no more alone
Amid War's heartless wilderness."

Pausing a moment, while a light
Of sad kindling fell on his stone
In his blue eyes. "To-morrow's fight
May leave my Mary all alone.
I know we soldiers should not shed
These childish tears; but you will tell
My darling one, when I am dead,
In death I love her just as well!"

* * * * *

Under the grand old forest-boughs,
Where first we met the demon storm
And breasted out its fiercest blows,
I found him, recumbent form.
Again he slept; but not again
To waken at my reverent tread.
No dreams disturbed him now; love's chain
Rests lightly on the happy dead.

"WHO DID IT?"

About half a mile from the village of Poaktown, facing the high-road to Balston, and separated from the river Peak by a small garden and a belt of trees, is a long, low cottage, known in the neighborhood as "The Building." It originally consisted of two cottages, and went by the name of "Maxwood's Buildings" but who Maxwood was, and what had led him to build such awkward cottages, had escaped the memory of the oldest inhabitant.

Mr. Joseph Vance, who was a spare, active, clean-shaven man of about forty, with grey hair and no whiskers, and with nothing remarkable about him, except a keen and over-hot right eyebrow, had now been occupying the building for a little over a year. When he first came into the neighborhood the gossips of Poaktown had speculated a great deal as to who and what he was, but without any basis for their conjectures, as he never himself volunteered any information as to his previous life, except that on one occasion he had been heard to say something, which led to the inference that he had been a sea-captain. People, too, who had been inside "the building" since Vance's tenancy, had noticed the drawing of a ship, and some shells lying about the room. This was considered enough to confirm his statement, and on the strength of it the village called him the Captain.

Nothing more was known of the Captain, and curiosity about him had nearly died out, when Sarah Epps, on her return from Stokesmouth, where she had been on a visit to her sister, who had married a pilot, had flourishing sea-going, brought news about him, which set the village ears tingling for some time. The pilot, her brother-in-law, remembered the Captain when he was in the coasting trade, and Sarah was full of stories of smuggling, and even piracy, to which the Captain had taken a headlong rush. But all knew that Sarah was given to an incorrigible gossip, and that any story under her management would grow considerably. The Captain meanwhile troubled himself very little about the village talk, living a quiet life in his lonely cottage, with his only servant, a buxom widow of thirty-five. Sarah Epps had been heard to say that she was more than a servant to him, but then nobody minded Sarah.

About the time our story commences the Captain had got into some troubles. His landlord, an easy-going, well-to-do tradesman of Poaktown, began to think that, as he expressed it, he should like to see the color of the Captain's money. The house had been occupied for more than a year, and not a penny of rent had as yet been paid. The fact had for some time been gradually dawning on the neighbors that, since the first months he had occupied the building, ready money had not been plentiful with the Captain, and that for the last eight or nine months little or nothing had been paid for. The sums owing were not large, for the Captain lived a quiet, simple life. But it was reckoned that, altogether, they must amount to over £100; and that was a serious sum to the village tradesmen, and to all appearance a very difficult one for the Captain to pay. He was damned, and legal proceedings were threatened, but all attempts to get money were only met by civil excuses. The patience of his creditors was nearly exhausted, when one day a circular letter was sent to them, appointing a meeting for twelve o'clock at the Admiral Benbow. "Now," the Captain wrote, "he would satisfy all claims, as a legacy left by a distant relation had been paid in to his account at the Balston Bank."

On Saturday the Captain walked into Poaktown, and hired a gig at the King's Arms to take him to Balston. Johnny Hitch, the landlord's son, drove him to the bank at Balston, where he staid about ten minutes, and came out with a packet of notes in his pocket, and some in the breast-pocket of his coat: a fat-looking pocket-book. Johnny then waited for him while he made a few purchases in the town, and then drove him straight home to the "building."

At six o'clock on Sunday morning the inhabitants of the quiet High Street of Poaktown were aroused by a violent knocking at the door of the police-station. The policeman on duty on night duty opened the door, and Mary Edgecombe, white with terror and panting with exertion, nearly fell into his arms, gasping out that her master, the Captain, had been robbed and murdered in the night. The inspector was immediately called, and the whole available police force, consisting of two policemen, set off with him for the building. Mary Edgecombe, who seemed utterly prostrated, remained with the care of the inspector's wife.

On reaching the "building" the inspector found the front unbarred, the windows closed, and the doors locked. On going round to the back the door leading from the sitting-room to the garden, which sloped down to the river, was found to be open, and on entering the sitting-room the dead body was seen along the carpet between the staircase and the garden-door. On the staircase itself the drops of blood were most frightful. The bedroom, how ever, was clearly the place where the murder had been committed. The table by the window had been pushed out of its place; the only two chairs in the room were lying on the floor. The bed, which had not been slept in, was thrown back, and in the middle of it was a deep indentation, as if a heavy body had been pressed down upon it. A large clasp-knife lay on the floor close to the garden-door, and by the door on the floor was an open pocket-book. So much the inspector saw at a glance as he entered. He took the pocket-book and looked carefully through it: it was empty; but lying near it, and behind the door, was a piece of neatly-folded paper. It had evidently fallen from the pocket-book while the murderer was emptying the contents. It was a half-sheet of note-paper folded in three, and written on in pencil. Unfolded it was found to be two bank-notes, the total of which amounted to £270. Here was a clew at once. The murderer, evidently wishing to conceal what nothing but which might aid detection, had left the pocket-book behind, but in his hurry had overlooked this note. Policeman Jones was immediately sent off to Balston with the paper, to inquire of the bank-manager whether these were the same notes which had been paid to the Captain the day before, and, if so, to take measures to stop them. He also requested that a detective-officer from Scotland Yard an account of the murder, and any facts he might ascertain at Balston.

So far so good: but where, after all, was the body? From the blood on the stairs and in the sitting-room, and the open garden-door, it was presumed that it had been removed from the house. After locking the bedroom door the inspector proceeded to the garden. Outside the door on the grass were the footmarks of a heavy man, as he came in by ward the house, and the heels deeply indented in the soft earth. The rest of the footprints were partly obliterated, but it was presumed that the body dragged over them. The murderer must have gone out of the sitting-room backward, dragging the body after him, and, when he had reached the end of the plot, and half-way through the belt of trees, the footsteps continued: there they ceased. On the left mould and leaves as high as a man as if a long heavy body had been laid there; near this impression, lying on the ground, was a knife, and at the bottom of the plot, where the ground had been dug up as if it had been intended to bury the body there. This spade was not to be found, and apparently had by given up, for the work was scarcely begun. The murderer had been interrupted, or perhaps had thought that the body would be discovered in the hole. But where? The policeman and the inspector looked at one another: they had come to the same conclusion. The body was not to be found.

On the river bank the footprints were again found. This time they pointed forward, and not backward, and the impression was very deep, as if the body must have been carried. The river at this point was deep and sluggish: there would be little difficulty in disposing of a body in the river. Mr. and Mrs. Inspector went home to breakfast, leaving a policeman in charge of the premises, with orders to admit no one except on business.

The inspector had hardly finished his breakfast when policeman Jones arrived from Balston. He had been eminently successful. The bank-manager had identified the numbers on the paper as those of the bank-notes paid the Captain the day before. The money, it appeared, had been paid to him in pursuance of an order contained in a letter received that Saturday morning from their London correspondents, Cowie, Nabob, & Co., the great China and Indian bankers. Jones had then made inquiries in the town and at the railway station. At the station he found that a man in a great-coat and wide-awake hat, who was muffled up in a comforter, had left by the second train for London, and that that morning for London by the 5.30 train. He had ordered a first class to be reserved for him. The clerk remembered this, from the difficulty he had in getting change so early on the Sunday morning. The note was produced, and found to be one of those stolen from the Captain. A description of the man and orders for his apprehension had been telegraphed to London, and an answer had been received, stating that the police were on the murderer's track, but that, to make all safe, a detective would be in Poaktown by the middle of the day.

Mary Edgecombe, who had partially recovered from her fright, was now taken to the building. She identified the knife, pocket-book, and various articles of clothing which were lying about the Captain's room as belonging to him. She stated that she had gone to bed at nine o'clock on the previous night; that the Captain was then still in the sitting-room; and that she had heard no noise during the night. She was positive that no one was in the house when she went to bed except herself and the Captain. The garden door was often left unlocked, and could then be opened from the outside. The inspector was satisfied. The motive was clear enough; the clews were close upon the murderer's track; all that was now wanted was the body.

He turned to the river, pleased at the promptness and energy he had shown, and chuckling to think that the London detective would find nothing to do when he did arrive. The dregs had now been at work for some time, but without success. The river had been dragged up and down, and sidewise and across, and at every available angle, but no body had been found. The inspector was getting impatient, when a gig drove up to the building, and a dapper little man in a frock-coat buttoned to his chin, and with a heavy black mustache, jumped out. The crowd which had collected by this time fell back respectfully, for it was whispered that the stranger was no other than detective Perkins from London.

In a few minutes the detective had heard all that the inspector had to tell.

"Well, inspector," said he, "let's get it all straight. All the village, you say, knew the Captain would have money to pay his debts to-morrow?"

The inspector nodded.

"Which amounted in all to £100, more or less?"

The inspector nodded again.

"And he drew out of the bank £270. Was that the whole legacy?"

"Yes."

"He didn't want £370 to pay £100, did he?"

This was a new light to the inspector, who shook his head confusedly.

"From whom did the order to pay the money come?"

"Cowie, Nabob, & Co."

"Cowie, Nabob, & Co," repeated Perkins, referring to his note-book; "the great China house. I'll pay visit to them on one?"

"No one except the man who passed the note."

"Of course. Is this woman who lived with him?"—suggested Perkins.

The inspector shook his head. "It's a man's doing. She was not strong enough. Besides, the footprints are a man's all over."

"No one who had a grudge against him?"

"There were a few debts that couldn't get their money from him, but that's not enough to account for this," said the inspector, jerking his thumb toward the river.

They entered the building. The crowd outside were getting more excited. They thought that now the murderer had been found the murderer would soon be dragged from his hiding-place and handed over to justice. Time, however, went on, and Perkins still remained on the premises, while his character was rapidly falling in the opinion of the crowd outside.

At last one conjurer. I told ye so afore," said one sturdy countryman who had been a skeptic from the first. And this time his assertion did not meet with a challenge. Perkins had called for the pronounced half an hour before. The crowd were tired of waiting.

Perkins meanwhile, unconscious of hostile criticism, had looked over the kitchen and Mary's bedroom, but without making any discovery. He came to the last room, the bedroom he stood in the middle of it and took a general survey. He then proceeded to the bed. He raised the chairs, and again put them down again in their original positions, repeating this operation two or three times, and walking round and round the room briskly. Then he came to the bed. He looked at it from all points: first a full view, then a three-quarters, then one side view, and then the other side view, till he had exhausted it and the patience of the inspector. He then stood and mentally threw himself upon it in such a position as to give the impression which still remained on it. There was some hitch, for he shook his head. He pulled out the drawers, and examined the under side of the deceased man's pair of boots lying in the corner of the room next the bed. Nothing, however, rewarded them and he turned to the bedside and examined the floor-cloth and carpet. He then raised the boot again, and seemed satisfied, for he pocketed it.

"Rest, I suppose, are the Captain's?"

"Yes, his servant identifies them," said the inspector, who was rapidly coming round to the opinion of the outside public. What on earth could the matter whether the Captain had two or three pairs of boots? At last Perkins finished his examination, and walked the inspector down stairs inquiring each stair as he went. These were apparently more satisfactory, for his face brightened considerably, and after he had shown the trace of blood along the floor of the sitting-room, it had expanded into a broad grin.

"You see how it was done?" asked the inspector, whose opinion of Perkins had by this time reached the lowest ebb. Perkins smiled, he was not the man to commit himself. He walked to the table, and turned over the books and papers till he found some sheets of blotting-paper. These he examined attentively, holding them up to the window against the light.

"Has anybody been in the room since the murder?" asked Perkins.

"No one except the man who passed the note."

"Of course. His name?"

"Cowie, Nabob, & Co."

"Cowie, Nabob, & Co," repeated Perkins, referring to his note-book; "the great China house. I'll pay visit to them on one?"

had suffered in the struggle for life, was left bare, and composed decently on his chest. The shaves passed through the dead man's chamber, some with dread, some in tears, none with indifference. At length came the confidential servant, wringing his hands and exhibiting excessive grief. The inquisitor bade him go to the corpse and touch its hand. The man smiled and made a ghastly effort to speak, but his lips were white and his face twitching with fear. The wife, with a laughing expression of confidence in his innocence, now seized his hand and approached the body. With a face blanched and with sweat, and with knees knocking together, the valet neared the corpse; his hand almost touched his master's inanimate fingers, when, with a shriek, he fell on the floor with the horrible confession pouring from his lips. He had been discovered by his fear-struck master as the person who would draw when the guilty hand touched its victim.

So his superstition convicted him, and by the aids of his mechanic benefactor he told the hideous story of murder and ingratitude.

IN THE RING.

It was a most difficult position. An invasion of ar mies, by six charming girls, upon the house of an elderly doctor, of small practice, slowly diminishing, in out-of-the-way neighbourhood, on whose few inhabitants live upon any thing and do nothing. Yet, such was my fortune, I, Adam Black, commonly called Uncle Adam, probably for the excellent reason of my being uncle to nobody, and therefore to every body, including these charming girls who had come on a mid upon me. So, instead of laughing, loving were they; full of admiration of all they saw—I, Adam Black, in house and garden, Uncle Adam's poor-chaise, and, they were pleased to say, Uncle Adam's agreeable society, that I should have been more than mortal if my heart had not speedily found itself riddled through and through.

"And now, uncle, since we mean to stay till tomorrow, how shall we mean to amuse us?"

"I'll tell you what, girls," said I, driven to sudden desperation by the youngest's proposing Readings from Tennyson's Dainty Thoughts, and Pollok's Course of Time, by way of passing the evening, "I'll take you to the circus."

I saw a slight shade flit over three of the six pretty—well, the six nice-looking faces—for pleasant women always look nice to me.

I asserted that I had a most talented company, which had been in the town three months, and the troupe were highly respectable people indeed, I had attended one of them professionally, but I did not think it necessary to state this). Moreover, I had been taken with a small party before, and never wanted a treat, and had enjoyed the evening as much as the child did. In short, as I told them, if my "nieces," though not by regular descent, ladies, would condescend to make themselves children for the nonce, to take pleasure in the innocent childish folly (there was a most original cheery, by-the-by), I would answer for it they would be exceedingly well amused.

So they put on hats and shawls—no need of white gloves and opera cloaks here—and off we sallied, through the cool bright autumn evening, to the quiet street where the circus was, a large wooden, temporary building. I had passed it often on my walks into town, but took little notice of it, and no interest in it; according to the commonly received fact, that one half the world neither knows nor cares how the other half lives—till my accidental visit lately.

Since then I had often paused to listen in passing to the sounds within, the band playing, and the horses galloping, and wonder if that heavy dull thud were still bounding through the flower-enwreathed hoops, and that agile boy turning somersaults after her, both on their "dear steeds." Always at that, what sort of thing was that "Wondrous performances of Signor Uberto on the Flying Trapeze," which had been announced night after night as the climax of attraction?

Poor Signor Uberto! it was him whom I had been deceived into by a sore hand, which had precipitated him from professional duty. He seemed a very quiet, respectable young fellow, and his name was John Smith. Of course I did not think it necessary to tell all this to my satirical young ladies; besides, a doctor's confidence should be always sacred, even if he is only a circus performer.

The performances had already begun when we entered. Above boxes and gallery were stretched out a mass of those honest eager faces which always make a minor theatre, or an accidental dramatic entertainment in the provinces, such a success. All were intently watching the careering round and round that magic "ring" of two beautiful horses, ridden by a boy and girl in the character of the "Highland Laddie and Lassie."

Ridden did I say? It was more like floating, flying, dancing on and on, up and down—pirouetting and attitudinizing in one another's arms—changing horses—galloping wildly, both on one horse. The boy was about twelve—the girl—why, she was not a perfect little fairy, with her white frock, her tartan scarf, and the hood tying back her showers of light curly hair, that tossed, and whirled, and swirled in all directions. Whether she stood, knelt, balanced herself on one leg, or wreathed herself about, in the supple way that these gymnasts do, she was equally picturesque. The little creature seemed to have no bones; she smiled, not in the dancer's stereotyped grin, but a broad, honest, childish smile, as she leaped down, made her final courtesy, and bounded along through the exit under the boxes.

But I can not specify each of the performances, though, I confess, after-events photographed them all sharply on my mind.

The last entertainment of the evening was the Flying Trapeze. Not every body knows what a trapeze is; a series of handles, made of short poles suspended at either end by elastic ropes, and fastened to the roof, at regular intervals, all over the stage. These handles are swung to and fro by the performer or his assistant; and the feat is to catch each one, swing backward and forward with it, and then to spring on to the next one, producing to the eyes of the audience, for a brief second or two, exactly the appearance of flying. Of course the great difficulty lies in choosing the precise moment for the spring, and calculating accurately your grasp of the next handle, since, if you miss, you fall.

"Ah," said my eldest niece, with a slight shudder, "now I see the meaning of those mattresses, which they are laying so carefully under the whole line of the trapeze. And I understand why that man, who took our tickets at the entrance, is so very particular in seeing that the handles are fastened securely. He looks anxious too, I fancy."

"Well he may. He is Uberto's father."

"Then, is it any thing very dangerous, or frightful? Perhaps we had better go?"

But it was too late, or we decided it was. Besides, for myself, I did not wish to leave. That strange excitement which impels us often to stop and see the end of a thing, dreadful though it may be, or else some feeling for which I was utterly unable to account, kept me firm in my place. And I sat there, seeing one by one the usual acts go, appeared a small slight young man, who looked a mere boy indeed, and in his white tights and flesh-coloured jersey muscle of an exceedingly delicate and graceful frame, was a model for a sculptor. He had long light hair, curling over his collar, after the fashion of acrobats, and thin pale features, very firm and still. This was the Signor Uberto, who was going once more to risk his life, on every trapeze performer must risk it—for our night's amusement.

He stood, while his father carefully tried the fastenings of each handle, and examined the platform on which were laid the mattresses. But the weak kindly face looked on, I fancy, in vain. Perhaps he was so used to it that the performance seemed safe and natural—perhaps he felt it was useless to think whether it was safe or not, the next part to perform. Or, possibly, he took all easy, and did not think of any thing.

But I could not help putting myself into the place of the young man, and wondering whether he really did recognize any danger, more especially as he knew, lurking and watching in the exit corner, somebody belonging to him—the young woman in black, who was his wife. I concluded, since when I visited him she had brought lint and rags and helped me to tie up his sore hand. Over this hand his father was carefully bandaging it, every day's loss of performance was a loss to the treasury. This was the first day of the Signor's re-appearance, and the people were in full force.

Popularity is seldom without a reason, and I do not deny that the flying trapeze is a very curious and even graceful thing. It is, at least, the extreme grace of the performer added to its charm. He mounted, agile as a deer, the high platform at the end of the circus, and presently, with a few electric ropes, clinging only with his hands, his feet extended, like one of the floating figures in pictures of angels, he flew to the first handle. Then, poise, and watching intently his time—for a second might prove either too late or too soon—to the other trapeze forward to meet him. The young man dropped lightly into it, hanging a moment in his hands while, with a backward swing of the body he was born to fly, then gave himself another swing and alighted safely at the far end of the platform.

This he did several times—three, four, five times, each time with some slight variation, and more gracefully than the last, followed by a low murmur of applause, which seemed to me somehow less to shout. The fifth time, when one had grown so familiar with the performance that one had almost ceased to observe it, I saw the young man's performer not as a human creature at all, with flesh and blood and bones, but as some painted puppet, or phantasmal appearance of light, in the dusk. The fifth time he missed his grasp of the second trapeze, and fell.

It was so sudden—one moment the sight of that flying figure—the next, a crash on the mattressed platform, on its edge, from which rolled off a helpless something, falling with a dull thud on the bare saw-dust floor below.

I heard a scream—it might be from one of my girls—but I did not look round them. Before I well knew where I was, I found myself with the young man's head on my knee, trying to keep off the crowd that pressed round:

"Is he dead?"

"I hope he's no dead. Give him some whisky. He's coming to, puir laddie!"

But he did not "come to," not for hours, until I had him safely in my own spare room, whither, after which happened to be my own house, for his lodgings were at the other end of the town.

All the long night—for added my seven half-crowns to tempt him, or rather the skin-flint father who was making money by him, to risk his life for the remainder of the week—I watched over the boy in the same had I not been there; but still I was there. I and my young ladies had swelled the number of the audience by one, and by this destruction, and I felt very guilty. What they felt, poor dears, I do not know; it was quite impossible for me to take any heed of them. My whole attention was engrossed by the case. I wonder if people suppose us surgeons hardened to it, when we get into the habit of speaking of our fellow-creatures merely as "a case."

No one hindered my doing what I would with my patient, so I had him removed to my own room—the spare rooms being occupied—examined him, and set a simple fracture of the arm, which was the only visible injury. Then I sat and watched him, as conscience-stricken as if I had been one of the old Roman emperors at a gladiator show, or a modern Spanish lady at a bull-fight, or a fast young English nobleman hiring rooms at the Old Bailey in order to witness a capital murder. For had I not sat calmly by, a spectator of what was neither more nor less than murder?

Somebody behind me seemed to guess at my thought.

"If he had died, doctor, I should always have said he had been murdered."

There was an intensity in the voice which quite startled me, for she had keys to quietly in the background that I had scarcely noticed her till now—the young woman in black. She was not a pretty young woman—perhaps not young at all—being so deeply pitted with small-pox that her age became doubtful to guess at; but she had kind, soft eyes, an intelligent forehead, and an excessively sweet voice.

If there is one thing more than another by which I judge a woman, it is her voice; not her set "company" voice, but the tone she speaks in ordinarily or accidentally. That never deceives. Looks may. I have known a pair of blue-eyed angels, and girls with features as soft and lovely as houris, who could talk in most dulcet fashion till something crossed them, and then came the hard metallic ring, which always indicates that curse of womanhood—worst of all faults in any unfaithfulness—temper. And I have heard voices, belonging to the plainest of faces, which were deep and soft, and low like a female's in an Æolian harp. I would rather marry the woman that owned such a voice than the prettiest woman in the world.

This young woman had one, and I liked her instantaneously.

"Who are you, my dear?" I whispered. "His sister?"

"He has none—nor brother either."

"His cousin, then?"

"No."

I looked my next question, and she answered it with the simple honesty I expected from the owner of that voice:

"John and I were play-fellows; then we kept company five years, and meant to be married next month. He wanted to mention it, or it would have been sooner. But Johnny wished to stop trapezeing and settle in some other line; and old Stone wanted money and wouldn't let him go. At last they agreed for six more performances, and this was the first night."

"He'll never perform more," said I, involuntarily.

"No, he couldn't with that arm. I am very thankful for it," said she, with a touching desperate clutch at the brightest side of things.

How could I tell her that I began every hour more to dread, that the broken arm was the least injury which had befallen the young man; that I feared one had been concussive to the spine, which are often produced by a fall from a height, or a railway injury, and which, without any external wound, crippled and killed for years or for life.

"No, he never shall do any thing o' that sort again," continued she. "Father or no father, I'll not have him murdered." And there came a new fierceness into her eyes, like that of a creature who has long been hunted down, and at last suddenly turns at bay.

"Where is his father? he has not come near him."

"Of course not. He's a precious coward is Old Stone, and as sharp as a needle after money, or at keeping every body else very likely to be wanted. But don't be afraid. I've myself got enough to pay you, Sir. That's all the better. He is my Johnny now."

This was the most of our conversation, carried on at intervals and in whispers during the night. My fellow-creatures behind the curtain, scarcely moving, except to do some feminine office, such as building up the fire noiselessly, cool by coal, as the night grew chill, and any thing I wanted, in way of food or medicine. Or else she sat motionless with her eyes fixed on the death-white face; but when I looked at her, I felt, in the dusk of the morning, the young man woke up in his right senses, and spoke fluently, but articulately—

"Doctor, I'm done for. I know you, and I know what's happened. Only just one word. I want Dorothy. Where's Dorothy? Dorothy!"

"Yes, Johnny," spoken quite softly and composedly. "Yes, Johnny. I'm here."

It was a strange scene. The first-rate city surgeon, whom, doubting my own skill, I fetched next day, could make nothing of it. There were no injuries, except the external, that could be found, except the broken arm; the young man lay complaining of nothing, perfectly conscious and rational, but his brain was paralyzed completely.

We called in a third doctor; he, too, was puzzled; but he said he had known one such case, known where a railway accident, a man had been brought home apparently uninjured, but having received some severe nervous shock, probably to the brain, which, after a few days, during which he lay yet, though it was years ago; suffering little, and with all his faculties clear, but helpless, he died. Johnny lay on his bed, not dying, but he lay yet, though it was years ago; suffering little, and with all his faculties clear, but helpless, and with all his faculties clear, but helpless, and with his arm healed, over and waited upon like an infant by his old wife.

For he was a poor man, and he had a wife, which was lucky for him," added Doctor A. "It's rather harder for that poor young fellow, who may live on for years to be a burden to those of his own."

"Hush!" I said; for he was talking loud in the passage, and close behind us stood poor Dorothy. I hoped she had not heard, but the first sight of her face convinced me she had; only women have at times a self-control that is almost awful.

Finding he could not get back to meet her I do not know, but I stepped quickly out of the house, and walked a mile or more to the railway station with my two friends. Then I returned to my thing I saw was Dorothy waiting on the ...ead, with my housekeeper beside her. ... I should observe, that good woman did not object nearly so much to a poor dying lad as to an evening party, and had taken quite kindly to Dorothy.

Yes, she had heard it all, poor girl, and I could not attempt to deceive her; indeed, I felt by instinct that she was a person who could not be deceived by me, to whom it was best to let the whole truth, satisfied that she would bear it well. She did, wonderfully. Of course I tempered it with the faint consolation that doctors are sometimes mistaken, and that the young man had youth on his side; but there the truth was, blank and bare, nor did I pretend to hide it.

"Yes, Sir. Thank you, Sir. Thank you for telling me all. My poor Johnny!"

I took her into the parlor and gave her a glass of wine.

"I don't need it, Sir; I'm used to sick-nursing. I nursed my sister till she died. We were dressmakers, and then Johnny got me as costume-maker to the circus. I can earn a good deal by my needle, Sir."

This seemed far away from the point, and so did her next question.

"His father won't help him, Sir, you'll see, not a half-penny. He's got another—wife he calls her, and a lot of other children, and doesn't care two pence for Johnny."

"Poor fellow!"

"He isn't a poor fellow," she answered, sharply, "he's a very clever fellow; can read, and write, and keep accounts; was thinking of trying for a clerk's situation. With that, and his needle-making, we should have done very well if we had once been married."

I hardly know what to answer. I felt so exceedingly sorry for the poor girl, and yet she did not seem to feel her affliction. There was a strange light in her eyes, and a glow on her poor plain face, very unlike one whose whole hopes in life had just been mistakenly blasted.

"Doctor, may I speak to you, for I've nobody else, not a soul belonging to me but Johnny. Will you let him stay in here for a week or two?"

"A month, if necessary."

"Thank you. He shall be no trouble to you. I'll take care of that. Only there is one thing to be done first. Doctor, I must marry Johnny."

She said it in such a matter-of-fact tone that at first I doubted if I had rightly heard.

"Marry him? Good Heavens! You don't mean—"

"Yes I do, Sir. Just that."

"Why, he will never be able to do a hand's turn of work for—however many years he lives! He will have to be tended like an infant for months, and may die after all."

"I know. He'd rather die with me than with any body. Johnny loves me. I'll marry him."

There was a quiet determination about the woman which put all argument aside. And, Heaven forgive me! if it needs to be forgiven, I tried none. I saw in the unfortunate fellow, who never was so happy as to have any woman loving me; but I have known enough of women to feel surprised at nothing of that sort. But Dorothy, I thought, and think still, that Dorothy was right, and that she did no more than was perfectly natural under the circumstances.

"And now, Sir, how is it to be managed?"

Of course the matter was easily managed; the better, and I found, on talking with her, that she had already arranged it all in her own mind. She was accustomed to consult when I explained to her that they might be married by my friend the minister, to whom I would explain the matter, on Monday morning.

"That will do," she said. "And now I must go up stairs and speak to Johnny."

I had no right to him, or how he received it, is impossible for me to relate. They told me nothing, and I did not inquire. It was not my business; indeed, it was nobody's business but their own.

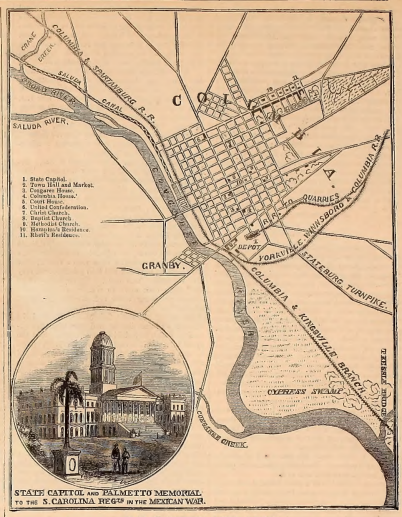
Now though I may say a very foolish old fellow, romantic, I am not such a fool as to be a fogey. Though I did take these young people into my house, and was quite prepared to assist at their marriage, considering it the best thing to be done for both under the circumstances, still I was not going to be present at it without having fully investigated their antecedents.

I went to the circus and there tried vainly to discover Uberto's father (who looked much more like a) I was sure I saw slipping away out of the ring, where the "Highland Lassie," in a dirty cotton frock, and a dirtier face, was performing on a pair of round in her beautiful horse, while in the centre, on the identical table of the night before—what an age it looked since!—the little fat man in shirt-sleeves and stocking soles was walking solitarily and solemnly upon bottles.

From him—Monsieur Ariel, who had been inquiring more than once at my house to-day, leaving his name as "Mr. Higgins"—I gained full confirmation of Dorothy's story. Johnny Smith's home were alike respectable and well-conducted young people, and evidently great favorites in the establishment. As I looked afterward, I also learned a few other facts, which people are slow to believe when first communicated, that it is quite possible for "play-actors," and even circus performers, to be very honest and decent folk; and then, if fact, it is a pleasure to drop of any belief by his calling, but solely by himself and his actions.

I hope, therefore, that I am passing no uncharitable judgment on the Hero and Heroine if I simply relate what occurred between us, without making any comment on his actions.

Finding he could not escape me, and that I sent message after message to him, he at last returned into the ring, and there—while the horses still went round and round, the little girl continued her leaping, and we caught the occasional click-click of Monsieur Ariel practicing among his bottles—the young man met and heard what I had to tell him concerning his son.



He was a father, and he seemed a good deal shocked for about three minutes. Then he revived.

It's very unfortunate, doctor; especially so for me, with my large family. What am I to do with him? What," becoming more energetic, "what the devil am I to do with him?"

And—perhaps it was human nature, paternal nature, in its lowest form—when I told him that the only thing he had to do was to give his consent to his son's marriage with Dorothy Hall, he appeared first greatly astonished, and then as greatly relieved.

"My consent? Certainly. They're both five-and-twenty—old enough to know their own minds—and have been courting ever so long. She's an excellent young woman; can earn a good income too. Yes, Sir. Give them my cordial consent, and, in case it may be useful to them—this."

He fumbled in his pocket, took out an old purse, and counted out into my hand, with an air of great magnificence, three ten-dollar notes. Which was all that I or any body else ever saw of the money of the Herr von Stein.

When I gave them, with his message, to Dorothy, she crumpled them up in her fingers, with a curious sort of smile, but she never spoke one word.

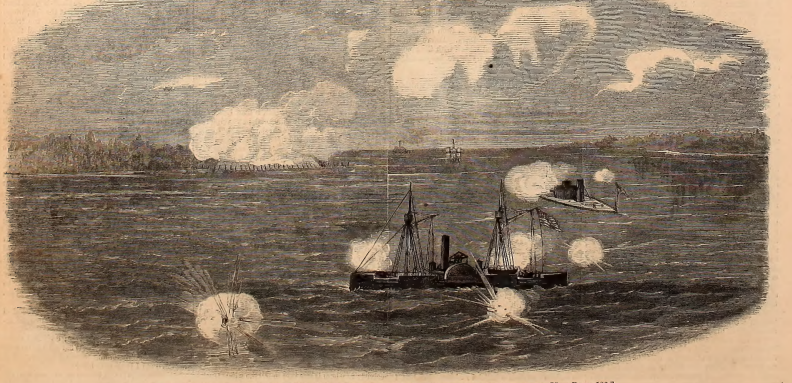
Uncle Adam has been at many a marriage, showy and quiet, gay and grave, hearty and heartless, but he is ready to declare, solemnly, that he never saw one which touched him so much as that brief ceremony which took place at the bedside of John Stone, the trapeze performer. It did not occupy more than ten minutes, for in the bridegroom's sad condition the slightest agitation was to be avoided. My housekeeper and myself were the only witnesses, and the whole proceeding was made as matter-of-fact as possible.

The bride's wedding-dress was the shabby old black gown, which she had never taken off for three days and nights, during which she, my housekeeper, and I, had shared incessant watch together. Her face was very worn and weary, but her eyes were bright, and her voice steady. She never faltered once till the close of the short marriage ceremony, and the minister—himself not unmoved—had shaken hands with her and wished her every happiness.

"Is it all done?" said she, half bewildered.

"Ay, lassie," answered my old housekeeper, "you're married, sure enough."

Dorothy knelt down, put her arms round Johnny's neck, and laid her head beside him on the pillow, sobbing a little, but softly even now.



"Oh my dear, my dear! nothing can ever part us more."

Heroine or not, Dorothy prospered. And in process of time her love was rewarded even beyond her hopes. Her husband's mysterious affliction gradually amended. He began to use his feet, then his legs, and slowly recovered, in degree, the power of walking. Not that he ever became a robust man; the shock of his fall, acting on an exceedingly delicate and nervous frame, seemed to have affected all the springs of life; but he was no longer quite invalided and helpless, and by-and-by he began actively to seek for occupation. I hardly know which was the happiest, himself or Dorothy, when I succeeded in getting him employment as a writer's copying clerk, with as much work as filled up his time, and saved him from feeling, what he could not but feel—though I think he did not feel it very pain fully, that his wife was the sole bread-winner.

When I go to see them now, in their cheery little home of two rooms, one devoted to dress-making, the other, half kitchen, half bedroom, in which John sits, I often think that among many fortunate people I have seen far less happy couples than John and Dorothy.

MISS MARY HARRIS.

On the 30th of January a clerk in the Finance Department at Washington, Mr. Andrew Jackson Burroughs, came to his death in a singularly tragical manner at the hands of Miss Mary Harris, a former lover. Mr. Burroughs occupied a desk in a room near the principal passage on the second floor of the Department. About midway in this passage there was a clock fixed, and at four o'clock P.M., a young lady who had been noticed sauntering about the hall during a good part of the day took her position in a doorway by the clock. It was the hour of closing business, and the passage was thronged with the retiring employés. She was waiting for Mr. Burroughs, and as the latter came from his room and passed by where she stood she shot him dead.

The lady gave her name as MARY HARRIS. She had resided in Chicago. She seemed about twenty years of age, was quite pale and delicate in complexion, with dark hair and eyes and an aquiline nose. The reason which she gave for committing the crime was that BURROUGHS had violated his promise of marriage to her, and had married another lady. Except in the simple violation of his word it seems he had done her no harm. She had met BURROUGHS in Burlington, Iowa, where her parents resided. Her parents had objected to her receiving his addresses, he being fifteen years her senior. But an attachment grew up between them, and they appear to have kept up a pretty regular correspondence. Their affair was broken off by BURROUGHS's marriage to another lady. On the 5th of last July Miss HARRIS instituted against Mr. BURROUGHS an action for breach of promise of marriage. At the close of the year she went on to Washington to carry on the prosecution, and the sequel of the painful story is given in the tragic event which we have related.

HON. DANIEL S. DICKINSON.

DANIEL STEVENS DICKINSON, besides holding various minor offices of public trust, has been Lieutenant-Governor of the State of New York, Presidential Elector at Large, United States Senator from that State from 1844 to 1851, and Attorney-General. Mr. DICKINSON was born at Goshen, Connecticut, in the year 1800. His father removed to the Chenango Valley, in Western New York, in 1806. He was brought up as a farmer's son and received only a common-school education. Gifted with a strong will, and an acute and quick intellect, he studied Latin without a master so as to be able to teach it himself. He also mastered and taught some of the higher mathematical studies, and among them the art of Surveying, which in early life he practiced extensively. He was for a number of years a teacher of common and higher schools—studied law, became a successful manager of justice cases, steadily rose in position and influence, and entered the higher sphere of political life by becoming State Senator in 1836. Mr. DICKINSON's political views are those of a patriotic and honest Christian man rather than of a partisan. He was an ardent Democrat from his youth up, but refused to act with that party when, in his opinion, it deserted its proper standard, taking then the position merely of an unconditional supporter of the Union and of the Administration, the success of which he believed indispensable to the success of the nation against the rebellion, and to the existence and prosperity of real American principles. Mr. DICKINSON is a strong and ready lawyer, an easy and forcible speaker; and what is far better, has an unspotted personal and political reputation. He is a believer in truth and justice and the real Democracy of our nation. He is still endowed with an almost youthful vigor, and we hope he may yet be spared to serve his country many years. Mr. DICKINSON has recently accepted the Presidency of an influential and enterprising new city Corporation—the New York and Liverpool Petroleum Company.

CAMP FORD, TEXAS.

CAMP FORD, the chief prisoners' camp of Texas, of which we give a sketch on page 132, lies on a sandy side-hill, three miles from the little town of Tyler, and one hundred miles west of Shreveport. A slight ravine bounds it on the southerly side, and in this rises a large spring of clear water not remarkable to Northern eyes, but far the best that any Yankee prisoner was ever refreshed with in TEXAS. Before the war the gay and festive youth of Tyler rode out to picnic at the spring; but now the trees around it have been cut away, its waters turned into a large long trough, and momentarily troubled by dirty panikins and buckets; while a hideous stockade fence cuts the spring in two and incloses many wretched home-sick hearts and weary broken forms. "The treatment of the prisoners," the subject of the day, has varied in a hundred ways. When a few officers were confined there, and the camp was commanded by Colonel Robert T. P. ALLEN, they were allowed to go out and play ball on parole, and the amiable wife of the Colonel daily visited their sick and brought them little luxuries of her own preparing. The authorities, however, reprimanded and then removed Colonel ALLEN for this, and under the rule of Lieutenant-Colonel BORDMAN men were shot down without notice, and recaptured fugitives were put in irons. An officer, for the crime of escaping, was made to "mark time" on a stump, bareheaded, in the scorching sun for three days (his guard under orders to shoot him the moment he stopped); an unfortunate sailor, for taking the name and place of a dead soldier, was bound hand and foot and buried alive for forty-eight hours. Filth, disorder, want, and wretchedness were allowed to have their way.

The oldest prisoners in the Confederacy are in this camp. Their imprisonment is now measured by years. On 21st January, 1863, the officers and crew of the Morning Light were captured off Sabine, and they still remain prisoners of war. A fatality seems to have attended all the naval prisoners who have found their way to a TEXAS prison-camp. Those of the Clifton and Sachem, captured at Sabine Pass, September 8, 1863, also share the same fate. Exchange after exchange of army prisoners takes place, but the boon never reaches these sailors. Soldiers have been taken from the same camp and sent back to our lines who have not been held as prisoners a month. Yet the gallant tars have shown a devotion to their flag unsurpassed, perhaps unequaled during the war. With the feeling that they have suffered gross injustice, with sense of neglect by their own Government, they have never deserted. There have been desertions to the enemy from this camp, but they have not been by sailors.

KINGS COUNTY COURT-HOUSE.

We give on this page an exterior view of KINGS COUNTY COURT-HOUSE, in the City of Brooklyn. This edifice is near the City Hall; it has been in the process of erection for the last four years, and is now completed. Mr. GAMALIEL KING is the architect. The Court-House we understand, was thrown open to the public on the twenty-second of February.

THE GOLD PEN—THE BEST OF ALL PENS.
MORTON'S GOLD PENS,
THE BEST PENS IN THE WORLD.

On receipt of any of the following sums in Cash, the Subscriber will send by return mail, or otherwise, as directed, a Gold Pen or Pens—selecting the same according to description, viz.:

GOLD PENS WITHOUT CASES.

For 50 cents, the Magic Pen; for 75 cents, the Lucky Pen; for $1 00, the Always-Ready Pen; for $2 00, the Elegant Pen; and for $1 50, the Excelsior Pen.—These Pens are not numbered, but correspond in sizes to Numbers 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 respectively.

THE SAME PENS IN SILVER-PLATED EXTENSION CASES WITH PENCILS.

For $1 00, the Magic Pen; for $1 25, the Lucky Pen; for $1 50, the Always-Ready Pen; for $2 00, the Elegant Pen; and for $2 50, the Excelsior Pen.

These are Well-Finished, Good-Writing Gold Pens, with Iridosmine Points, the average wear of every one of which will far outlast a gross of the best Steel Pens; although they are recommended, cheap, durable, and unimpeachable.

MORTON'S WARRANTED PENS.

The name, "A. Morton," "Number," and "Quality," are stamped on the following Pens, and the said Pens are warranted for six months, except against accident.

The Numbers indicate the sizes only. No. 1 being the smallest. No 6 the largest, adapted for the pocket; No. 4 the smallest, and No. 10 the largest Measured Gold Pen, for the desk.

Long and Medium Nibs of all sizes and qualities. Short Nibs of Nos. 4, 5, 6, and 7, and made only of first quality.

The Long and Short Nibs are fine points; the Medium Nibs are Broad, Coarse Business Points. The engravings are fac-similes of the name and styles.

GOLD PENS WITHOUT CASES.

For $1 25 a No. 1 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 3 Pen, 3d quality.

For $1 50 a No. 2 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 3 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 4 Pen, 3d quality.

For $2 00 a No. 3 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 4 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 5 Pen, 3d quality.

For $2 25 a No. 4 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 5 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 6 Pen, 3d quality.

For $2 75 a No. 5 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 6 Pen, 2d quality.

For $3 50 a No. 6 Pen; $4 50 a No. 7 Pen; $5 75 a No. 8 Pen; $7 50 a No. 9 Pen; $7 00 a No. 10 Pen—all 1st quality.

THE SAME GOLD PENS, IN SILVER EXTENSION CASES, WITH PENCILS.

For $3 00 a No. 1 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 3 Pen, 3d quality.

For $3 50 a No. 2 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 3 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 4 Pen, 3d quality.

For $4 00 a No. 3 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 4 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 5 Pen, 3d quality.

For $4 25 a No. 4 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 5 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 6 Pen, 3d quality.

For $4 75 a No. 5 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 6 Pen, 2d quality.

For $5 50 a No. 6 Pen, 1st quality.

GOLD PENS, ALL FIRST QUALITY, IN SILVER-MOUNTED DESK-HOLDERS.

For $3 75 a No. 4 Pen; for $5 25 a No. 5 Pen; for $4 00 a No. 6 Pen; for $5 75 a No. 7 Pen.

For $7 50 a No. 8 Pen; for $8 a No. 9 Pen; and for $9 a No. 10 Pen.

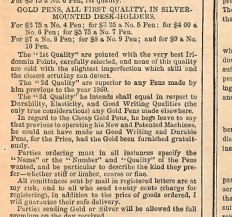
The "1st Quality" are pointed with the very best Iridosmin Points, carefully selected, and none of this quality are sold which have the slightest imperfection when tried on the closest scrutiny can detect.

The "2d Quality" is particular to say Pens made by him previous to the year 1860.

The "3d Quality" he intends shall equal in respect to Durability, Elasticity, and Good Writing Qualities the only true standard—the best Gold Pens made in 1860.

In regard to the Cheap Gold Pens, he begs leave to say that previous to entering his New and Extended Business, he could not have made as Good Writing and Durable Pens, for the Price, had the Gold Been Exhibited gratis.

Parties ordering must in all instances specify the "Name" or the "Number" and "Quality" of the Pens wanted, and be particular to describe the kind they prefer—whether stiff or limber, coarse or fine.



All remittances sent by mail in registered letters are at my risk, and to all who send twenty cents (stamps for Registering) in addition to the price of gold pens, I will guarantee their safe delivery.

Every pen of silver or silver will be allowed the full premium on the day received.

TO CLUBS.—A discount of 10 per cent. will be allowed on sums of $12, of 15 per cent. on $24, and of 20 per cent. on $40, if sent to one address at one time.

FARMS IN ILLINOIS.

900,000 ACRES
OF THE
BEST FARMING LANDS, FOR SALE BY THE Illinois Central Railroad Company,
IN TRACTS TO SUIT PURCHASERS,
AT LOW PRICES.

The Illinois Central Railroad extends from Dunleith, in the north-western part of the State, to Cairo, in the extreme southern part, with a branch from Centralia, one hundred and thirteen miles north of Cairo, to Chicago, on the shore of Lake Michigan—altogether a length of 704 miles—and the land which is offered for sale is situated upon either side of the track, in no instance at a greater distance than fifteen miles.

Illinois.

The rapid development of Illinois, its steady increase in population and wealth, and its capacity to produce cheap food, are matters for wonder and admiration. The United States Commissioner of Agriculture estimates the amounts of the principal crops of 1864, for the whole country, as follows: Indian corn, 120,541,603 bushels; wheat, 169,695,823 bushels; oats, 176,699,064 bushels; of which the farms of Illinois yielded 128,356,135 bushels of Indian corn; 23,971,173 bushels of wheat; and 24,272,751 bushels of oats—in reality more than one-fourth of the corn, more than one-fifth of the wheat, and almost one-seventh of the oats produced in all the United States.

Grain—Stock Raising.

Pre-eminently the first in the list of grain-exporting States, Illinois is also the great cattle State of the Union. Its fertile prairies are well adapted by nature to the raising of cattle, sheep, horses and mules; and in the important interest of pork packing, it is far in advance of every other State. The seeding of these prairie lands to tame grasses for pasturage or hay, offers to farmers with capital the most profitable results. The hay crop of Illinois in 1864 is estimated at 3,160,725 tons, which is more than half a million tons larger than the crop of any other State, excepting only New York.

Cotton, Tobacco, Flax.

The cultivation of tobacco and cotton in southern Illinois has been largely stimulated by the high prices which have prevailed since the outbreak of the rebellion. The crop of tobacco in this State, for 1864, is set down at 19,807,722 lbs; and while the returns from the cotton-growing counties are incomplete, they are yet sufficient to show a large increase in the product—the most careful calculations placing the increase at fifty per cent. Sorghum is now classed among the staples of Illinois. The making of sugar from the beet is receiving some attention, and experiments upon a large scale will be made during the coming season. Hemp and flax are grown in almost every part of the State, and of a quality equal to the best European.

Fruit.

Almost all the fruits of the temperate latitude are produced in Illinois. Peaches, pears, plums, strawberries, and every variety of garden vegetables, are produced in great abundance in the central and southern districts of the State, and are supplied to Chicago, St. Louis and Cincinnati, the excellent railway facilities insuring a quick market in all these places.

Inducements to Settlers.

The attention of persons, whether limited means forbid the purchase of a homestead in the older States, is particularly invited to these lands. Within ten years the Illinois Central Railroad Company has sold 1,600,000 acres, to more than 20,000 actual settlers; and during the last year 204,422 acres—a larger aggregate of sales than in any one year since the opening of the road. The farms are sold in tracts of forty or eighty acres, suited to the settler with limited capital, or in larger tracts, as may be required by the capitalist and the great farmer is made easy payments, cash and credit.

PRICES AND TERMS OF PAYMENT.

The price of lands varies from $9 to $15 and upwards per acre, and they are sold on short credit, or for cash. A deduction of six per cent. from the credit price is made to those who purchase for cash.

EXAMPLE:

Forty acres at $10 per acre, on short credit; the principal one-quarter cash down—balance one, two and three years, at six per cent. interest, in advance, each year.

	INTEREST.	PRINCIPAL.		INTEREST.	PRINCIPAL.
Cash Payment		$100 00	Payment in two years	$24 00	$100 00
Payment in one year	12 00	100 00	three years	18 00	100 00

The Same Land may be Purchased for $360 Cash.

Full information on all points, together with maps, showing the exact location of Lands, will be furnished on application, in person or by letter, to

A Song of Songs.

From the perfumed golden Sun-Land,
Where the herbs give strength divinest,
Where the fruits yield richest flavor,
I have drawn my wondrous power.
Power not to make but healing
As for Sickness's Prevention:
Trying Health's each rear flower,
With a grand unfailing Vision,
By the glorious human power.
Water made by Heaven for Oil
Whose dire use to only found in Pain and Costly Doctor-Bills!
Would you then save Time and Money?
Would you steel your Nerves and Muscles?
Would you keep the pangs of Sickness?
Would you keep by Action's shrine?
Would the Talisman to Inspire
Yet MY beverage divine—
Add a teaspoon of me only
To a tablespoon of cold water;
Drink it first thing in the morning;
Same before your night's resting—
This the recipe
And your cure? I bear you question:

While Brandreth's Pills are so Potent for good to diseased bodies, they are harmless as bread. The babe at the breast or the man of ripest years, and delicate females, are certain to receive an increase of health from the use of these Pills, blessed of Heaven.

It has been said by an able physician, that "the medicine sleeps inside and never injures." Wherein is the superiative quality? The BRANDRETH PILLS have no power or action but upon impure humors in the blood. Those and only the impurities in and around the parts affected by disease; all the parts involved in diseased actions are operated upon, and cleansed from all foulness, and restored with "all the" to the vanished curative powers contained and inherent of the most justfamed BRANDRETH'S PILLS.

CAUTION!

Millions of people, whose lives appeared to be at the last ebb, were out by fever's consuming fires, by consumption's brilliant or wasting, by racking disease of inflammatory rheumatism, have been cured by these Pills. These persons are living witnesses, and thousands are the voices of every part in America.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box, enveloped in full directions. Purchase none unless my PRIVATE GOVERNMENT STAMP is on the box. See that it is BRANDRETH in white letters.

The subscription is so nearly completed that it is intended to close the same on or before the 28th of February.

Subscriptions, $750,000, of which $600,000 purchases the land—in all, 62,680 acres. The remaining $150,000 is the permanent cash working capital of the Company.

Capital stock, $6,000,000. Par value of shares, $100.

Subscribers to this purchase will receive eight shares of stock for each one hundred dollars subscribed. Lands located on the Little Kanawha and Elk Rivers, in the counties of Gilmer and Braxton, in the very heart of the oil regions of West Virginia.

Professor Richardson reports: "Your property is the very centre of the West Virginia oil regions. It has numerous oil and gas springs along the banks of its streams, one of which vies with the famous 'Burning Spring' itself."

Professor Shepherd, of New Haven, Conn., reports: "I consider it eminently oil-producing land. The oil-bearing shales underlie it extensively, and the long lines of accumulated bitumen, or illuminating gas springs, some of which I am burning, as well as the appearance of oil itself on the surface of the tract, fully confirms me in this belief.

"There can be no doubt that along your creeks and tributaries will be found a large quantity of valuable oil-producing territory. The predictions amount of bituminous and mineral coal, iron ore, limestone, and fire-clays embodied in the high hills on your property, the tops and slopes of which are covered with an extraordinary growth of white oak and other heavy timbers, will immensely to its value."

These views are fully indorsed by the reports of the most practical and experienced men from the oil districts of both Pennsylvania and Virginia.

The Company considers themselves fortunate in having secured the services of Mr. Blackwell, a practical civil engineer, for the general superintendency, as well known as the late Chief Engineer and Superintendent on "Commissioners of Washington Heights," New York City.

Arrangements are in rapid progress for the immediate development of the property on a scale commensurate with its value and extent.

Subscriptions payable at the time of subscribing, or one-half in cash, the balance in thirty days from the time of closing the subscription. What it was that changed Miss Flora M'Flimsey from a frivolous girl into a sensible woman.

"Oh, May!" said Miss Flora M'Flimsey one day,
"We must buy no more goods of importers, they say:
"We must study economy—saving must try:
"So a sewing machine I'm determined to buy.
"Now which is the best? Pray tell, for you know
"You have tried every kind; you do nothing but sew.
"Which is your favorite? Mind, don't tell fibs."
May answered, naively, "Why—WILLCOX & GIBBS.

"'Tis a dear little beauty, a bright busy bee;
"The motion is exactly a rabbit's."
"You can learn all its ways in a single half hour,
"And feel that you've gained an all-conquering power.
"'Tis so noiseless and neat 'tis a sweet little elf:
"To be rich it brings ease; for the poor it makes pelf.
"I never have now that sharp pain in the ribs,
"And I own the great comfort to WILLCOX & GIBBS."

Miss Flora, entranced, not a moment would wait,
But drove down Broadway to live hundred and eight.
In she flounced, in she flourished, but through all her prinking,
A look in her face showed that she had been thinking.
She bought a machine, then homeward she hied;
A little child's agony for practice she tried;
And would you believe it? two nice little bibs
She made in two hours on WILLCOX & GIBBS.

Absorbed and delighted, no note did she take
Of time, or the lever who came in its wake;
For lever to vibe, that great muff, Master Willie,
With motion all wax and expression all silly.
In vain did he scold her, and swear like a Turk
'Gainst the dignity, beauty, and goodness of work.
She's all changed! What has done it? I never tell this?
'Tis that magical lever of WILLCOX & GIBBS.

The subscription price is $20 per share for a limited amount of stock. No further call or assessment to be made on subscribers. $100,000 is reserved for a working capital, and $800,000 in stocks as par, for the future development of the Company's property.

Its property consists of a perpetual lease of about 75,000 acres of oil territory in San Luis Obispo County, State of California, lying on and near the Pacific Ocean, being all the following five ranches, viz.:

I. The Manuela Ranch, containing 16,954.83 acres.

II. The Arroyo Grande Rancho, containing 4837.38 acres.

III. The Bolsa Chemical Ranch, containing 14,533.22 acres.

IV. The Piedra Ranch, containing 8838.89 acres.

V. The Stone Corral Ranch, containing 30,611.20 acres.

The titles of these large tracts have been thoroughly examined and approved by Judge Parsons, of San Francisco.

All reports, written and verbal, of gentlemen who, during the past year, have visited and thoroughly examined this property carefully and scientifically, concur in representing it as overflowing with Petroleum. They say:

"The Ranches are splendid estates, but their value is in their almost fabulous wealth in the best of oil."

The Company's lands extend for over ten miles on San Luis Bay, on the Pacific coast, with a good anchored, where shipments can be made with facility to San Francisco, South America, Australia, China, and New York.

The lands have a gentle slope to San Luis Bay, and there is full assurance of the practicability of conducting the oil, at a moderate expense, through pipes from the wells to reservoirs or tanks, to be constructed at this point, when it can be sent to the markets of the world, either in its crude state or refined, according to the demand.

The cost of shipping will not exceed 50 cents per barrel, and the Company will be enabled to deliver petroleum at New York at $5 per barrel, and at Australia and China at reduced rates.

It is designed to develop fully and practically the means and wealth of this property at the earliest practicable moment.

The varied details, giving all the information that can be required, with a general description of the character, advantages, and prospects of the Company's property, are fully and plainly set forth in the prospectus.

THE PACIFIC COAST PETROLEUM COMPANY, of New York, have been duly organized under the laws of this State, with a sufficient capital to render available its capabilities and resources in what is believed to be an unlimited supply of Petroleum, now pressed for quality.

Subscriptions for the Stock of the Company have been opened at the office of CAPTURE OF WILMINGTON.

THE City of Wilmington was captured by the combined forces of General SCHOFIELD and General TERRY, with the co-operation of Admiral FOOTE'S fleet, on the 22d of February, WASHINGTON'S birthday. Fort Anderson was evacuated by the enemy on February 19. General SCHOFIELD, with 8000 men, had advanced against this work from Smithville on the 17th, while FOOTE opened a bombardment from the water. The Monitor Montauk was placed close up to the works, and four gun-boats enfiladed the fort with their fire. On the 18th FOOTE moved up closer to the enemy, and was able to bring fifteen vessels into the engagement. At 3 o'clock P.M. the batteries in the fort were silenced. COX'S division of SCHOFIELD'S corps had in the mean time got into position in the rear of the enemy. AMES'S division of TERRY'S army was in co-operation. This manœuvre led the garrison of the fort, which numbered about 3000 men, under General HOKE, to abandon the work. Twelve heavy guns were taken with the fort, and a large supply of ammunition. The line of works occupied by the enemy stretched from Fort Anderson, on Cape Fear River, across to Masonboro. This line, of course, had now to be abandoned.

After the capture of Fort Anderson the rebels only made one stand in the strongly intrenched lines four miles below Wilmington, extending—as did their first line—across the peninsula. On the morning of the 20th TERRY pressed hard against this line, while SCHOFIELD again flanked them by a movement so rapid as almost to effect a surprise. The rebels retreated hastily, but were so hotly pushed by SCHOFIELD that the latter succeeded in cutting off their rear, capturing 375 prisoners, and two guns. Admiral FOOTE'S fleet contributed greatly to this result.—TERRY then advanced against the enemy's last line of works. On the morning of the 22d he found that these works had been abandoned, and at the head of his army marched into the city. There was considerable manifestation of loyalty on the part of the citizens. About 700 prisoners were captured and 30 guns. Four or five hundred Union prisoners were released. The One Hundred and Fourth Ohio Regiment has been assigned to do provost duty in the city.

The fleet, after the capture of Fort Anderson, found the river above that point infested with torpedoes. Admiral FOOTE dispatched a fleet of boats, about 30 in number, and manned with our gallant tars, up the river, to explore and buoy the channel and to clear it of torpedoes. We have illustrated this expedition in the subjoined cut. When the fleet reached Wilmington on the 22d the later portion of the day was devoted by our sailors to the celebration of WASHINGTON'S birthday.

The capture of Wilmington not only seals the victory gained by the capture of Fort Fisher, but is especially important as an element in the combinations against the rebel armies of LEE and JOHNSTON.

THE ANGELS' SONG.

I KNOW I have heard them sing, Child,
And I know that they spoke to me,
With my mother's arms about me,
While I sat on my mother's knee;
And she told me of love that saved us,
And a Father we had on high,
And the grave that we need not fear, Child,
And the soul that can never die,
In the glow of the summer lime-trees,
In the glow of the summer's day,
And I heard them singing faintly then,
For their voices were far away.

Again, when I walked with the Loved one—
You remember the Loved one, dear—
And the smile that is gone from among us,
And the voice that we must not hear,
The voice was so tender and earnest,
That you was too deep for mirth,
And my heart was too full for speech, Child,
And Heaven had come down on Earth.
Not a drop in the cup seemed wanting,
The thirst of a life to fill,
And further and fairer the song died out—
But I heard the Angels still.

Then the Loved one was taken from me,
And I bowed my head in my hand,
For my heart was free on a silent sea,
And I was alone on the strand.
The day had gone down for me, Child,
The light of my life was fled,
And I longed for the sleep of an endless night,
And to lay me beside the dead;
Then I stood to the arm that smote me,
With a prayer from a bended knee,
And my heart climbed up to meet the song,
And the song floated down to me.

I have heard them so often since, dear,
At church on the Sabbath morn,
When the organ swells, and the praise goes up,
That "To a Child is born;"
And here in the hush of my home-life,
And deep in the little one's play,
And once in the tremble of twilight,
At the turn of the night and the day.
Each time they call in a clearer strain,
They sing in a sweeter tone,
And I look for the Reaper to house the grain,
And the Master to claim his own.

I know it will not be long, Child,
For they bid me home at last,
To the place where the pledge of the Future
Is linked to the Love of the Past,
Where the lonely may seek a shelter,
Where the friendless may find a friend,
Where the weary desire shall be granted
That has trusted and loved to the end,
Where there's fruit in the gardens of Heaven,
From the hour that on Earth was betrayed,
Where there's rest for the soul, life-wearied,
That has striven, and suffered, and prayed.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MARCH 11, 1865.

THE FOURTH OF MARCH.

ON this day President LINCOLN enters upon his second term amidst the benedictions of the loyal citizens of the United States. No man in any office at any period of our history has been so tried as he, and no man has ever shown himself more faithful to a great duty. His temperament, his singular sagacity, his inflexible honesty, his patient persistence, his clear comprehension of the scope of the war and of the character and purpose of the American people, have not only enabled him to guide the country safely in its most perilous hour, but have endeared him forever to the popular heart.

Forty hate has dashed itself to pieces against his spotless patriotism. Friendly impatience has long since hushed its hot criticism. Foreign skepticism and professed contempt at length recognize in him a purely characteristic representative of that America which conquers by good sense and honest fidelity. The history of the first term of his administration is the story of a desperate and prodigious civil war waged over a continent, and revealing the unprecedented power of a Government founded upon the popular will.

Such a war necessarily clothes the chief executive magistrate with extraordinary power. Yet it is the most significant tribute to the character of Mr. LINCOLN that his exercise of that power has been so temperate and so purely patriotic that after four years' experience all parties crumble away, and he is continued in his high office by the hearty confidence of the vast body of the people.

And that he is to-day inaugurated amidst universal applause, that the nation has not been deluded by the vehement party sounds which every civil war makes so practicable and specious, but has known and approved a man so just and true, is the noblest proof of the truly conservative character of that popular Government with which the name of ABRAHAM LINCOLN will henceforth be associated.

AT THE CONFESSIONAL.

WE commend to our Copperhead friends, who have always sneered at the policy of enlisting colored soldiers, the report prepared by an Adjutant of General LEE's. Now that the rebels concede the valor and value of such troops their allies at the North will agree that they are most excellent material for an army. Fort Wagner, Milliken's Bend, Port Hudson, and every field upon which black troops have fought, could not prove their bravery and discipline; but the word of LEE's Adjutant will doubtless convince those who have never had any opinions until they received them from slave-drivers.

The paper of which we speak cites the conduct of the colored soldiers in our army, as well as the experience of every nation by which they have been employed, as proof of their peculiar fitness for the service. But the remarkable point of the document, which contains nothing new to those who are familiar with the question, is the admission throughout of the bitter wrong of slavery.

The plan proposes to give immediate freedom to those who do best, not the promise of freedom at the end of the war to all who fight. This is offered as the highest conceivable incitement to bravery and fidelity. But how can it be so if the blacks were made for slaves, and are happy and contented in that condition? What kind of an incitement would it be to an ox to tell him that if he moved fast he should be thrown into the river at night? How would a fish be stimulated by the promise of being laid in a clover pasture?

Again, the plan argues elaborately to show that a soldier does not think; that an army is a machine; that discipline makes a man fight equally well upon any side. But what is the point of the argument? Slavery being the divine supplement for all men of African descent, and being also the most divine institution for them, why rely upon discipline to prevent their thinking? The more they think they are fighting to perpetuate the bondage they have heretofore lived, the better, if it be true that they are born for it.

Since this debate was opened among the rebels, every word they say has convicted them of the consciousness of the foul injustice of slavery. It disproves every thing they have asserted about the coffee-house; and the thoroughly contemptible it leaves the Northern teadies of the delectable system! What says Bishop HOPKINS to this flying in the face of Providence? What says Mr. ROBERT M. T. HUNTER to this departure from the divine ordination? What have become of the curse upon HAM, and the conclusive argument of ORESTES? Whither has disappeared the divine purpose indicated in heels and shin-bones? The whole ghastly imposture collapses before the dire necessity of facts. They are as good men as we are, if they will only fight for us, cry the pale rebel chiefs as they feel the wind sucking before the cold of DECEMBER.

Meanwhile let the gentle Copperheads ponder one question. If the slave-lords confess that their chattels are fit to be free, how long will it be before the good sense of the country declares that they are fit to vote?

RECONSTRUCTION.

It is remarkable that one of the most important questions of the war was lately decided for the present in Congress by a single party close vote, and almost without exciting public attention. The bill for reconstruction, involving the very consequence of the war, was lost by a majority of five or six.

There is certainly no subject upon which the public mind should be more fully enlightened before legislative action than this, and therefore we can not regret the present postponement of a final decision, which gives the country time for ample consideration.

One thing is clear. Whatever the special terms of any system of restoration may be, and whether there be any at the moment or not, yet the essential point must be the security of peace. No mere theory of the Constitution will suffice. The practical point is that the nation, from the highest statesman to its life, shall take care that it does not yield to political arts what arms have not been able to control for ever.

FERNANDO WOOD gives us the rebel theory of solving the question. "Congress has no power to make conditions on which a State may resume its position in the Union. Whenever the people of a State shall lay down their arms and recognize the Federal Constitution and laws, and send representatives to Congress, I should like to see the power which would prevent the return of those States." Here we have the rebel view of the matter, and FERNANDO WOOD having said what he thinks we should do, every loyal American citizen knows exactly what ought not to be done.

It is for the Government, not for the rebels, to decide when it may withdraw its troops and when it is no longer in danger from rebellion. This is a point which can not be determined by oaths, but by experience. The Government must decide what tests to employ. It is not bound to remove its troops from a region full of rebels, nor is it to assume that they are loyal because they say so. As the national army advances it recovers the various States. Provisional Governors will be of necessity appointed. They hold by the national authority. They summon the people to an election, and, of necessity, they determine by the same authority who shall vote and under what conditions. This or anarchy is the alternative.

In any system of restoration whatever, which contemplates permanent order and actual quiet, the national Government takes the initiative, and holds the State until it is satisfied that with perfect safety to the country its hold may be released. The fundamental question is, therefore, what tests are satisfactory. Is it enough that the voters swear allegiance to the Government? Is it enough that emancipation be accepted by the State Legislatures? Is it necessary to disfranchise certain classes? Is it necessary to enfranchise certain other classes?

But whatever tests be decided upon these points one end is paramount—the national safety; and the whole movement proceeds by one authority, that of the nation. Of course it is exceptional. Of course it is abnormal. Of course it would be absurd to say that in a time of profound peace the national Government could altogether suppress the State authority. But of course it would be still more absurd to contend that in the settlement of this civil war it could not. The supreme consideration now is national safety, not State rights. To insure the tranquil operation of the States in their spheres hereafter, it is necessary to adjust them by the national authority now. The loyal citizens of any State in rebellion are, in the eye of the national Government, the State; and to defend them against violence within and without the State, and to secure them in their defense, the national Government will justly do whatever the vital necessity of the case, not State precedents, shall require. And of that necessity the Government is the judge.

The bill reported by Mr. ASHLEY was lost, as we understand, for two reasons. The Opposition voted against it as an unconstitutional invasion of State rights, and some friends of the Administration because they did not like its terms. The bill seemed to some of these last too sweeping in disfranchisement, and to others unjust because it did not allow the black population to vote. Governor SHORTER so radical a Union man as Mr. JULIAN, of Indiana, was found voting upon the same side with FERNANDO WOOD.

There is a similar anomaly in the Senate, where Mr. SUMNER and Mr. POWELL, of Kentucky, both oppose the Louisiana bill. Mr. POWELL, because the State election was held under terms prescribed by the national authority; and Mr. SUMNER, because those terms excluded the colored population from the polls.

We are glad that the present defeat of the bill enables us all to consider the subject more maturely. The principle of such a bill is beyond debate. Congress would be treacherous or imbecile if it did not provide for its inevitable emergency. Public opinion must now indicate what terms the bill shall prescribe.

THE FATE OF THE REBELS.

IT is a common remark that the wounds inflicted by civil war heal quickly. Mr. EVERETT, in his Gettysburg funeral oration, repeated it, and unfortunately illustrated it by the English restoration of CHARLES SECOND—unfortunately, because CHARLES's reign was one long act of vengeance, which his brother JAMES continued, until the nation rose again and expelled the STUARTS forever.

The truth is, that such wounds do not and can not heal quickly. The English civil war began in 1642; and in 1745 the Jacobites took arms again. The reasons are obvious, and equally obvious are the reasons why, in this country, we should be as gentle and humane in our feelings as possible, and, to our last statement of them, as firmness of purpose and security of settlement will allow. As we have constantly said, there has been no vindictive feeling upon the part of the loyal nation since the war began; and although the Presidents has been sharply censured for his tender heart and incessant pardons and commutations of severe sentences, his conduct has responded to the deepest popular feeling. The long national forbearance under the most atrocious outrages of prisoners in rebel hands shows how perfectly clear of hatred or anger the public mind is.

This disposition will deepen with increasing victory, and the danger is not that we shall punish too relentlessly, but that we shall imperil the result which the war should secure. Magnanimity is not weak forgetfulness nor weakness, and firmness is not revenge. For a just solution of this terrible struggle, it is essential that every man bear constantly in mind the inescapable wickedness of the system for which the insurrection was long prepared and the utter criminality of its leaders. For more than a generation the whole life of the debauchery of the national conscience. For all that time they devoted every power and opportunity to confusing the sense of right and wrong in the nation, and to corrupting the fundamental principles of the Government. To this end they appealed to all that is basest in human nature. They made the name of the United States hated as a bully abroad and a slave-driver at home. They created that public sentiment in the governments of Europe that hailed our probable destruction with delight. At home they annihilated the most fundamental constitutional rights of free speech and equal citizenship; and when they thought that the national mind was sufficiently enervated and corrupted they drew the sword, believing that the mere sight of its edge would compel the quaking nation to terrified submission to their will.

These are the crimes of the leaders of the rebellion, and they are crimes that can never be safely forgotten. Those leaders are to be remembered not for the blood of the war, not for the young and noble of every section of the country whom they have sacrificed, not for the broken hearts and wasted homes and desolate land, not for the war, but for that conduct and purpose which made the war inevitable. The Earl of STRAFFORD did more than any single man to precipitate the struggle between CHARLES FIRST and the Parliament. STRAFFORD was executed before a drop of blood was shed. But no student of history and human nature can justly fully condemn the extraordinary act by which he fell.

What STRAFFORD was willing to do that the rebel leaders have done. First they corrupted the people by arts, and then they tried to overthrow the Government by arms. But STRAFFORD's punishment would be inadequate for theirs. We neither wish nor expect to see a single capital execution follow the war. If England had taken NAPOLEON BONAPARTE to the Tower and shut him at midnight in a ditch, as he murdered the Duke D'ENGHIEN, there would have been a painful sense of tonal inadequacy between the offense and the penalty. NAPOLEON's fate had some proportion to his career. JEFFERSON DAVIS, even if he falls into the hands of the nation, will not be long in the power of any living man. Congress he should be individually and forever disfranchised as an American citizen, and then delivered by the ordinance of the nation to be as sought first to debase and then to destroy.

As for the great mass of the people in the Southern States, they have always been taught by their leaders to hate us, and they have learned the lesson. Only time and constant intercourse will wear away that feeling. And it is clearly the duty of every loyal man to help its removal, not by any twaddle of sentimentality about "the South" being "a great people;" not by embracing the dearly-beloved brother QUARTERLY, or weeping over the grave of that precious friend of our souls, WINDER; but by clinging steadily to the great principles of an equal government, and showing by example how freely men of one mind may abide for soul and body in liberty than slavery.

SHERMAN AND THE REBEL PRESS.

SHERMAN continues his "retreat" from Chattanooga to Richmond. The perils of his prodigious march are plain; but his unconquerable genius is plainer. The Edinburgh Review which, looking at him and GRANT across the sea, declares that since BONAPARTE and WELLINGTON there has been no such soldiership, will have fresh reason for admiration and delight as the details of his new campaign appear. We must remember that we are yet to know the history of his march across the swamps of Georgia and South Carolina; but in the memoirs of LIEUTENANT HANLEY, describing the operations of the Revolution in the same region, we can see the immense difficulties to be overcome.

We are yet to know also how formidable a resistance the rebels are to offer to his advance. If rhetoric and fustian could annihilate him, SHERMAN would be already extinct. If swagger and bluster could win a cause, the rebellion would be triumphant. But why will not the rebel newspapers remember their own gasconade from month to month and year to anniversary? Their enemies will be captured or slain. The defeat will be equally fatal to him.....Let SHERMAN gain two great victories over us, and he and his army are ours. But we will have them on cheaper and better terms. He will gain no victory. His lines of communication will be cut off. He will be compelled to attack HOOD behind his intrenched camp, will be defeated, and, seeing no hope of escape, he and his army will surrender at discretion. This is the most probable result, and it will come, sooner or later, and whether he captures Atlanta or not, he and his army will be captured, or cut to pieces in the attempt to retreat."

This was on the 6th of August, three weeks before SHERMAN took Atlanta. On the 23d of February, a week after he occupied Columbia, the South-side Railroad in Richmond Examiner said: "He may march through South Carolina to Charlotte or to Wilmington; but he conquers nothing, he holds nothing. The communications are destructible but not subjugating. The first mistake ruins him, the first check becomes a defeat, a rout, and will prove the destruction of his army."

In the Examiner probably any wiser on the 23d of February than the Sentinel was on the 6th of August? Do the newspapers expect to save the rebellion by eternally prophesying disaster to SHERMAN? He knew, says the Examiner, that all the fighting men were gone out of South Carolina, leaving scarcely enough to carry on the government of the State. But there's a lion in his path. Very well. We do not deny that there may be. We know the extreme uncertainty of war. But if South Carolina be, as the Examiner says, abandoned to old women, why does it say in another article in the same number that "the progress of SHERMAN through South Carolina almost unopposed, the fall of Columbia without the slightest resistance, the swiftness of the enemy's movements, and the apparent ungenerability of the Confederate commander, has created very serious apprehensions on the part of the public as to the military condition in that State?" But why so? If, as the Examiner insists, there are only "graybeards, old women, and halfwitted children," left in the State, why should not SHERMAN'S progress be almost unopposed? and why should the failure of graybeards and little children to stop the march of a great army and a able soldier create serious apprehensions as to the military situation?

The discrepancy betrays the falsehood. It was evidently supposed that SHERMAN'S march would make a stand on South Carolina. That he did not alarms the Richmond leaders. Forced to account for a thing unimagined possible, they declare the State emptied of its fighting population, but in the same breath whisper their surprise and alarm.

We know how critical such a campaign as this of General SHERMAN'S is. We know how many and unexpected are the chances of war. We exhort every man to hold his mind open to sudden reverse and disappointment. But at the same time we beg him not to suffer his heart to be dismayed by the insinuations, head-shakings, and prophecies of the rebel press.

LOSS AND GAIN.

The rebel newspapers in Richmond not only profess to regard the recent successes of the national arms as blessings in disguise, but they insist that it is a fortunate event for the rebellion that it is relieved of its seaports. Even the loss of Wilmington they assert will merely compel them to develop their own resources.

Let us take them at their word. Let us concede that it is an advantage to the rebellion to be shut out from the coast entirely. But if it be, why was it not always so? And if it were, then the blockade of the coast has been a military error. Or will it be said that it was necessary to hold it for some time in order to get foreign supplies of arms that now have grown enough that we can safely lose it? But granting this, the ports were as useful for sending out as for taking in. The expenses of the rebel war must be paid in money. It has never been pretended that they could be paid by an internal tax. The great resource is cotton. The very last financial plan of the rebels contemplates the sale of "Government cotton on hand." But with the ports all closed, how is the cotton to be sold! The rebels have received arms and supplies from Europe, and the foreign loan has been based upon cotton. The closing of the ports cuts off the supply of cotton. The failure of the cotton by their reasoning, therefore, spoils their whole financial plan.

But there is another view. Look at the port of Wilmington again. The rebels inform us that it is of advantage to them to close it. Suppose that we grant it. Is it no advantage to us to gain it? That is a consideration for them quite as important as the other. It is not a question to argue. The map settles it. Take the situation of the campaign. See what SHERMAN has done. Between Savannah and Wilmington is an empty shell, shout the rebels. But do they suppose that it is considered valuable to us in itself? Wilmington is worthless as a capture, for it is not a war of conquest or aggrandizement in the usual sense. But Wilmington is invaluable as a base for a great army advancing through North Carolina and co-operating with another before Richmond.

Even if it were true that it is an advantage for the rebellion to lose it, it is no less an advantage for us to gain it. And the result is not less than the military advantage. As DR. DRAPER well said in his late lecture, there is no force like success. It is not the success that ends every war; it is the sense of the power of the sword. That consciousness conquers the mind, and then mere muscle relaxes.

EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS.

WHEN General GRANT announced that the exchange of prisoners was now left entirely to him we were very sure that he would not be unjust to any soldier that defends our flag, and we are therefore not surprised to read in a letter from City Point to the Herald that "the first lot of negro soldiers exchanged during the war, fourteen in number, were delivered to Lieutenant-Colonel MELFORD yesterday among a lot of white soldiers. If left to act unofficially there is no question but that the Confederate authorities will gladly exchange negroes for white men; but if called upon to recognize the rightful status of a black soldier, in any official form other than [illegible] decline to do so." The action of the rebels is taken unquestionably because they intend to put colored soldiers into the field, and reflect that, if the rule is that such men are not to be exchanged, it is a rule that will work both ways.

SHERMAN'S ACCURACY.

On the day before SHERMAN moved from Dalton upon his march through Georgia, a gentleman at his head-quarters wrote, "W. go to-morrow. You will hear of us on the coast on Christmas." He ate his Christmas dinner in Savannah. On January 31st, the day before the present movement began, the same gentleman wrote, "You will hear from three weeks from the coast of North Carolina." On the 22d of February Wilmington was evacuated, and SHERMAN'S base was established upon the coast of Carolina.

MR. CHILDS AND THE PHILADELPHIA "LEDGER."

IT is a good thing for the public when a good newspaper falls into good hands: and therefore we congratulate Philadelphia that the Philadelphia Ledger, one of the most popular journals in the country, has passed from the hands of MR. SWAIN, originally a printer's boy and the founder of the great prosperity of the Ledger, into those of the well-known publisher, GEORGE W. CHILDS.

MR. CHILDS'S energy, tenacity, skill, and practical genius have been conspicuously displayed as a publisher; and his shrewd knowledge of the popular taste, and his wide acquaintance of an influential journal, will heighten the singular prosperity of the Ledger. His unswerving patriotism secures the fidelity of the paper to the great principles which are at stake in the war, and his discreet and genial temper assure the public of the urbanity with which all opinions will be treated. The field for the distribution of the Ledger is immense. Its daily issues are not less than seventy thousand, and it goes to every part of the community. We cordially wish MR. CHILDS a great increase in his new relation of that success which he has fairly achieved in his old.

BOUND VOLUMES.

FOR a short time the Publishers have been unable to supply the orders which they have constantly received for complete sets of "HARPER'S WEEKLY," since of the first volume the numbers became exhausted. These have been reprinted, and the Publishers can now furnish any or all of the bound Volumes, eight in all. Each Volume contains the Numbers for a year, commencing with the 1st of January. The price of the Volumes, bound in muslin and gilt lettered, is Seven Dollars. They can not be sent by mail, the weight of the Volumes being greater than is allowed by the Postal Laws. They will be sent, They will be sent by Express, freight paid by the Publishers, for the above sum.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE SITUATION.

THE rebel papers in Richmond have been prohibited from publishing the news of SHERMAN'S movements northward. By the latest Washington reports concentrations of the army opposed to SHERMAN, which is reported to be under the command of General JOSEPH JOHNSTON, are: 30,000 men, made up as follows: from Savannah 8000; from Charleston 5000; from Georgia 5000; from various parts of North Carolina 6000; 7500 cavalry under WHEELER and BATTLE. This is the only force of any kind under the immediate command of SHERMAN. General THOMAS'S Western campaign for the present closes with the capture of Eastport, and the perfect occupation of the line of the Alabama River as its entire purpose. We shall soon hear of the co-operation of Mobile.

The House has passed the Senate bill to prevent the introduction into the portion of its present session in the consideration of proposals for the amendment of the Constitution abolishing or extending the forfeiture of the real estate of rebels beyond the lives of the present owners. The Senate has also under discussion to recognize the present State Government of Louisiana. Progress of this will be watched for by those who secure the ratification of the Constitutional Amendment.

The Senate has confirmed JOHN SHERMAN.

CONGRESS.

February 23:

In the Senate, the House bill to build a ship canal around Niagara, and the bill to build a canal connecting Lake Michigan with the Mississippi River, were reported back, the first from the Foreign Relations Committee, the latter having surveys to be made with a view to the construction of those works. A bill was passed to amend the Copyright Law so as to authorize the copyrighting of photographs; and a joint resolution was adopted to submit a report to the United States shall be forwarded to the library of Congress a failure to which forfeits the copyright.

In the House, A. P. Field was brought before the bar of the House charged with contempt of the House. The Senate resolution freeing the wives and children of colored soldiers was passed.

February 24:

In the Senate, Mr. SUMNER submitted for the report of the Judiciary Committee on the constitutionality of the government in incorporating States was rejected by a large majority. A joint resolution was introduced into the Southern States from representation until that privilege was also accorded them by the act of Congress.

In the House, the bill repealing the law which prohibited the forfeiture of the estate of rebels beyond the natural lives was passed by a majority of one. In the Senate resolution freeing the wives and children of colored soldiers was passed.

February 24:

In the Senate, the bill granting $300 to the surviving heroes of the Revolution was passed. The Fortification bill was passed, the appropriations being cut down one half.

In the House, the Senate joint resolution directing inquiry into the condition of the Indian tribes was p[illegible].

February 25:

In the Senate, the joint resolution recognizing the State Government of Louisiana was taken up and debated throughout the entire session.

In the House, the Senate bill to inquiry was passed as to the number of rebel prisoners who had enlisted into our service.

February 27:

In the Senate, the Conference reports on the Army and Navy Appropriation bills were agreed to.

In the House, the Fortification bill was returned from the Senate, and the amendments, reducing the appropriations one-half, was concurred in. The Enrollment bill was passed. One section of this bill provides that no person of foreign birth, who has resided in the United States for three years preceding his arrival at the age of twenty-one years, shall be exempt from enrollment and draft on account of being an alien. The remaining sections provide that the mustering in of a substitute shall be conclusive in favor of the principals, and exempt him from military service for the term for which he was drafted. Assistant Provost-Marshal General is appointed by the Secretary of Interior, and chargeable with the duties intermediate between the Provost-Marshal General and the District Provost-Marshal. Any person who has been or may be drafted for one year, and who furnishes a substitute for the remainder of three years, shall be exempt for this period of time. It shall not be lawful for any person to engage in the business of procuring recruits or substitutes for money or profit in any State or subdivision thereof, without a license or authority in writing. The party is to file proof of his loyalty and good character. Any one found to the amount of $50,000 that he will faithfully observe and obey the laws and regulations which may be prescribed relative to recruits or substitutes. Any recruiting agent who ceases to be entitled any time to remain, or convicts, or persons under indictment for felony, is to be punished by fine and imprisonment; and any officer knowingly employing any deserter, or insane person, or person in a condition of intoxication, or any person without the consent of his parent or guardian, shall, on conviction, be dishonorably dismissed from the service. Persons who go to procure substitutes are to be notified of the fact, in order that their places may be supplied promptly, and such notice be given to the principals within thirty days. In addition to the other penalties provided for the punishment of deserters or of naval service, all persons who have deserted, who shall be taken and convicted thereof by a Provost Marshal's Court in sixty days, shall be deemed and taken to have voluntarily relinquished and forfeited their rights of citizenship and their right to become citizens; and all persons who shall hereafter desert, or who shall aid, abet, or assist or depart from the jurisdiction and go beyond the limits of the United States with intent to avoid any draft duly ordered, shall be liable to the penalties of this section, and the President is authorized to issue his proclamation that he will pardon those who return and serve out their original term. The bill was passed by a vote of 82 to 64.

The CRISIS OF THE BATTLE.—In one of the battles on the Mississippi, the Confederate General Pillow called out to his men, "Boys, the day is lost, but send powder!" Captain DUNCAN, first the crisis has come." DUNCAN, without waiting to consult with his men, or to receive orders by their gun, already shotted and primed, and simply called out, "All right!" The men were intelligently surprised at the order, there being no particular object within range, when an aid-de-camp of the Confederate staggered up. "Where is Pillow, what shall we fire at?" "Fire at the crisis," said the gunner, "and you have the honor to tell it come!"

THE SOVEREIGNS OF EUROPE.—There are in Europe forty-three reigning sovereigns, not including those who are constitutional. Of these forty-nine there belong to the Roman Catholic religion, but one of that number is excommunicated—the King of Sardinia—and two to the orthodox Greek Church, one a Mohammedan, and the other a Pagan in Japan. The Catholic sovereigns are Austria and France; four Kings or Queens—Bavaria, Portugal, Prussia, and Wurtemburg; Belgium, Naples, Spain and Monaco. The excommunicated Sovereign is Victor Emanuel. The Church over which the Pope of Roman Catholic religion are the nine Kings or Queens—Denmark, Greece, Holland, Hanover, Oldenburg, Saxe-Coburg, Saxe-Gotha, Grand Dukes—Baden, Hesse, Mecklenburg-Schwerin, Mecklenburg-Strelitz, Oldenburg, Saxe-Weimar, Saxe-Meiningen, Saxe-Altenburg, Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, Saxe-Meiningen, Saxe-Altenburg, Saxe-Coburg, and Saxe-Weimar, Saxe-Gotha, Saxe-Coburg, Schwarzburg-Rudolstadt, Schwarzburg-Sondershausen, Reuss-Greiz, Reuss-Schleiz, Schaumburg-Lippe, Lippe-Detmold, Waldeck, Anhalt-Dessau, Anhalt-Bernburg, Anhalt-Cothen, Hesse-Homburg, Liechtenstein, the Elector—Hesse-Darmstadt; one Landgrave—Hesse-Cassel; one Duke—Brunswick Greek Church—Emperor of Russia, and the Mussulman Sovereign the Sultan. There are besides in Europe sovereigns who are not Roman Catholic—San Marino and Andorre; and five whose religion is Protestant—Switzerland, Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Frankfort, and Lubeck.

A ROMANCE OF THE HAREM.—A Constantinople letter says: "Even in the conversions from Mohammedanism to Christianity, or from the latter to Islamism, fewer still of the Ottomans have been influenced by motives connected with women. One of those very exceptional cases has, however, just occurred, in which the apostate is a young Belgian girl named Cocleiier—the niece of the proprietor of the well-known English shop in Pera—who, despite all the popular errors as to the status of women in the Turkish Empire, has risked every thing to unite her lot for ever to the faith of Mecca for love of a seductive young Turk. For some months past the Sultan Abdul Aziz, finding frequently to harems in Stamboul to take military music to play to the ladies of them, appears to have made the acquaintance of the young Effendi in question, his acquaintance with whom ripened rapidly into love, and when on her sudden disappearance, on Sunday week, revealed for several hours in anxious ignorance of her whereabouts. Late in the evening, however, a note from the fair runaway put an end to all doubts and fears, announcing the step she had taken, and firmly stating her determination to cast her lot with that of her faith in spite of every opposition. A personal interview, on the following day, with her father, in which he found the Ambassador also had taken sanctuary, failed to shake this resolution; and, accordingly, on Monday she was formally received and made the first of the necessary declarations which precede formal admission into the pale of Islam. The Belgian Legation then interfered, and later in the week the young convert appeared in court attended by two of her countrywomen, and by almost unknown years of age, and possesses the barren personal attractions which are dear to the eyes of the Turkish gentleman in question. Before the Minister of Foreign Affairs, in company with her national Minister, she declared again, this time with entire purpose to abjure Christianity, in spite of all that could be said to the contrary, and to adopt the Mussulman faith. Further details are wanting, but the conversion before finally committing herself to so grave a step. In the case of a runaway the Belgian Legation has every her right to make the change, on the ground of non-age; but in that of a Mussulman it has no power to interfere, her local reception into Mussulmanism is suspended until the Legation has formally declared her of age. The affair has been the nine days' talk of Pera."

AN IRISH SCHOOLMASTER PUT OUT.—A country schoolmaster, being asked by a visitor to point out the most ancient class of pupils and wrote down the questions which he would put to them, and handed them to the boys. They arrived, and so did the bagwalls, all but one. The pupils were asked to read the questions aloud, and after a little giddy until the question of the absentee came, when the schoolmaster said: "In whom do the Jews, the Christian Bonaparte," was the answer quickly returned. "You be—" "No, Holy Catholic Church, try next one." "No," said the youngster, amidst roars of laughter; "the boy that you mean is the Protestant Church, and he's not a boy—he's at home sick abed."

THE BONAPARTE FAMILY.—It may not be forgotten that a member of the Bonaparte family was offered forty years ago the throne of Greece. He was then a boy of fifteen, a mere himself in his sketch of Joseph, eldest brother of the First Napoleon. Joseph and his family at that time took refuge on the banks of the Delaware, thinking of nothing but of doing good to their neighbors, and of enjoying the peace which surprised and touched him. A deputation of Greeks came to offer to the princes of his family the crown of Mexico. The ex-King of Naples and Spain answered that republican institutions were not to his taste, nor a crown, and I would not take a single step for a third. Nothing can be more flattering to me than to see mankind, when I was in Madrid, refused to recognize my authority, come now in my exile to ask me to put myself at their head. But I do not believe that the throne you wish to raise up can make you happy; and every day I spend on the hospitable soil of the United States proves to me more and more the excellence of republican institutions for America. Preserve them, then, as the precious ark of your safety. That is and to remain your code: imitate the United States, and look out among your own citizens for some one more capable than I am to play the great part of Washington."

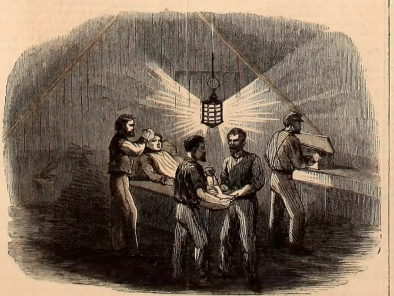
VIEW OF PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA.

WE gave some weeks since a view of Petersburg, taken by an English artist in the rebel lines. We give this week another view of that town, taken from a point on our extreme left. It now appears quite probable that the rebel General-in-Chief will soon find it absolutely necessary to evacuate Petersburg. The great value of the rebel position here has been that it afforded a more satisfactory base than Richmond, or rather that it preserved the communications southward from Richmond itself. This position not only covered the Southside Railroad, but was the only possible support to Fort Darling, the loss of which would open up the James to our gunboats. But SHERMAN'S advance will soon render both Petersburg and Richmond useless to the Confederacy. If General LEE insists upon retaining them, he will soon be isolated from the Confederacy, of which his army is the chief defense.



We give on our first page an illustration of our soldiers before Petersburg, receiving their rations of quinine and whisky, which are issued to them twice each day. These rations are very efficient safeguards against diseases of the camp.

BEFORE PETERSBURG—FIELD HOSPITAL OF THE FIRST DIVISION, NINTH ARMY CORPS.—[FROM SKETCHES BY A. MCCULLUM.]

FIELD HOSPITALS.

WE have engraved on this page a number of sketches, illustrating various scenes in the Field Hospitals of our army. Although these sketches especially relate to the hospital of the First Division, Ninth Corps, they yet have a general application to all other hospitals of the same class. The feature which will immediately engage the reader's attention is the neatness and taste displayed in the life of our sick soldiers, and in all their surroundings. No labor is spared in beautifying the grounds, and all the internal arrangements are controlled with a tasteful skill that does credit to the directors. Cleanliness and comfort are secured to the disabled soldier; his diet is prepared with great tact and carefulness, and every appliance which surgical art has invented is used to promote the comfort of the wounded.

HARPERS FERRY.

We give on pages 152 and 153 some recent and characteristic sketches of Harpers Ferry. The little village is situated in one of the most picturesque defiles in America, at the junction of the Potomac and Shenandoah. Harpers Ferry has now an important military history. It has been the startingplace and the goal of numberless marches. Hither and thither the waves of war have swept over it, and it is no longer the peaceful retreat which five years ago was so attractive to the tourist. The marches of Federals and Confederates have left behind their ugly traces. It is not a strong military position, being commanded by eminences on all sides. Last summer, before his celebrated victories at Winchester, Cedar Creek, etc., General Sheridan was so continually in the habit of falling back on Harpers Ferry that his men bestowed upon him the humorous sobriquet of "Harper's Weekly."

THOU ALSO.

I MUSOUAT that we twain together
In one night have blent our days;
If under no light of passion,
Yet in safer, shadier ways:
Or never, by one, that evening,
Yourself had I dared to claim;
So I thought:—some day, proud maiden,
You may wish you had thought the same.

'Tis true, I am grave and silent,
You, lively as bird on wing;
But there's strength in the latter summer,
And only a promise in spring;
And I thought that our differing natures
Would have linked in the wedded name:
So I thought:—some day, proud maiden,
You may wish you had thought the same.

There are gales that change in an instant
Still sun to burning snow;
And I thought I would be your pilot
If ever those gales should blow;
I'd have guarded you, oh! so safely,
Against ill that came;
So I thought:—some day, proud maiden,
You may wish you had thought the same.

COUSIN SILE'S OIL FARM.

"THAT most dreadful smell! What on earth is it? Sally Ann!"

"Praps it's the lie; some folks does'n't like it. How do de, Cousin Peter?"

It was the same chubbermaid. I knew that at once. But turning, I was puzzled to guess who the stranger was. To my knowledge I had never seen him before; or I never should have forgotten him. Long and lank, with straw-colored hair and blue eyes like dull glass beads, with a nose long enough to have made one apiece for three ordinary faces, and with apparently two joints in it, both movable, and a long expanse of yellow cheek awful to behold. Attired also in the blue, long-tailed coat and brass buttons, the yellow vest and tall white hat of the stage Yankee. I verily believed that some one of my theatrical friends had played a trick upon me, and was visiting me in masquerade.

"Eem'n, Cousin Peter?" said the presence again; and I replied, upon my guard against a practical joke,

"And you, what am I to call you, Sir?"

"Lor', don't stand on no ceremony; I ain't stuck up if I am forehanded. Jest call me 'Cousin Sile,' like you used ter."

Then I knew him. It was Cousin Silas Peek, whom I had not seen since we played marbles, and robbed bird's-nests together down in the Jersey. Broadway was marked by the sniffs of pedestrians against whom we brushed, and ejaculations of "Awful!" "Horrid!" "Horrible!" "Awful!" "Awful!"

They had a party at the Wicketts—an elegant, select affair, graced by the belles and exquisites of the crême de la crême. Cousin Silas had his stuff and on his fingers through his hair I felt my heart sink. He seemed such a greasy wretch. I expected to be ordered from the house when I said to Mr. Wickett aside,

"My dear Sir, I've taken the liberty of bringing with me a distant cousin of mine, Mr. Peek—a gentleman—a rather unsophisticated gentleman—a—in fact, just from his extensive oil-farm, where he has amassed a fortune, and, I fear, learned but small of the observances. I—ahem."

To my astonishment Mr. Wickett shook me by the hand.

"No apologies," he said. "These busy and prosperous people are perfectly welcome. I expect of them what we do of others. Introduce me."

All kindness to me, of course. I felt grateful. So I introduced Mr. Peek, and he and Miss Wickett, who was divine in scarlet with white flowers. How I adored that girl! How I fretted on her smiles! How I repined on those rare occasions when I dared to say sweet nothings to her—when she would answer me as only she could look! Every man has been in love once in his life, they say. If so, every man can recall his own experience, and know how I regarded William Wickett. Words can not do justice to my emotions.

In her presence I forgot my cousin Silas Peek for a while. But soon, in the midst of the silence in which we listened to Wilhelmina singing, I heard his voice, and, turning, saw him. He stood in the midst of a group of gentlemen, till with their faces very red with excitement and their eyes wide open with surprise, and bold forth on the subject of oil.

How his tract spouted, Sir, as of eleven thousand whales was underneath the earth. How folks went on their knees to get the first supplies of that lie. How he did verily believe that, diggin' down six feet, you'd come to a great vat full, all ready to be scooped up; and how all the ile streams and ile wells jest had their rise in Peek's farm, and nowhere else, by jingo!

And when she had done singing, Wilhelmina—I mean Mr. Wickett, darted from the crowd, and, seizing her hand, drew her toward Silas with the words, "My love, I must make you acquainted with Mr. Peek, one of our pioneers, who has been advising us some valuable information on the subject of oil lands."

Poor Wilhelmina—she who shuddered at the unpleasant perfume of a marigold, and could not bear the faintest touch of the gardener had uprooted that obnoxious weed—how I pitied her as the atmosphere of my horrible oil cousin surrounded her as the ether surrounds the sun!

"For my sake you have borne it, angelic girl!" I thought; and followed her with my eyes as Silas took her down to supper, saying, on the stairs, "I wish I'd a thought to fetch along a bottle o' ile, you could a seen how fine it ate on salad. And, I tell ye, there ain't nothin like it for a hair ile. Reckon you've noticed how slick mine looks. It would take that kink out o' your'n in no time."

Then we had a departed! I could not help breathing in her ear, "I appreciate your kindness, most amiable of mortal women—angel!" And also smiled as I felt Silas' hand upon me out-goggling.

The next day there came to me a dainty note, written as an old friend might write. Papa was away, but mamma requested her to write. Could Mr. Paragraph dine with them on Wednesday, and bring his dear, old, agreeable cousin Mr. Peek, who had so interested papa about his wells and things, along with him? And she remained

Sincerely Wilhelmina Wickett.

Of course Mr. Paragraph could. He was only too happy. Cousin Silas turned his paper collar on the other side, and went also.

Mr. Wickett, Mr. Bungales and Mr. Trumps, of the firm of Wickett, Trumps, and Bungales, to meet us; and the conversation ran on oil so entirely that it took me some minutes. But when we should care for food we could sit near Wilhelmina Wickett, and feel the folds of her silken robe brush his coat-sleeve as she passed. I permitted to her the plate for more turkey, and to see that she had "just a mossel more gravy." Not I for one. A delicious certainty that my day-dreams were to be fulfilled, and that I would one day call Wilhelmina my own.

That night I drew her little note of invitation from my bosom, and, kissing it, repeated, alluding to the signature,

"Remain Wilhelmina Wickett. Oh, no! no! not long, for I shall make you Wilhelmina Paragraph. Does she not smile upon my oily cousin for my sake?"

Yes, she had been very kind to Silas. She continued to be so. Mr. Wickett, papa, also. The members of the firm Trumps and Bungales. They made Silas Peek the fashion, and lovely girls called him a dear creature.

When we passed along the street people ran to look at the proprietor of the "Peek Oil Farm," and then would whisper,

"That's his cousin, Mr. Pierre Paragraph the poet. I hear that I shone by reflected light. The light of oil.

I began to see at last that poetry was as nothing beside prose. Cousin Silas Peek was rich, and all his farm's sake. That he was a veritable lion. A man bowed down to and adored. He had influence with the firm. Mr. Wickett was conversed resolved at once to "put his money into oil."

I should myself if I had had any.

At last a horrible suspicion dawned upon me. It was idiotic. I laughed at it. Yet it remained.

One day, when dining with Cousin Silas at the Wicketts, it forced itself into my mind. I resolved to banish it forever, and seized the moment when Wilhelmina and Cousin Peek were both absent, about ile, and we, Wilhelmina and I, were on the garden balcony.

Then I began:

"Wilhelmina, you must long have known—"

But she put up her hands and implored,

"Please don't, Mr. Paragraph!"

"I must," said I.

"I'll go away if you do."

"Nay, stay and hear me."

"Oh dear! Fie-o-e-cane—"

"Angel, we have no auditors. Your father and my cousin have forgotten all in oil. My heart—"

"Oh, you mustn't say any thing about your heart. We're friends, in quite a tragic way."

"It's wrong for me to hear it."

"Wrong to hear my fervent protestations of adoration? Say that you believe I love you better than my soul! I—"

"Oh! what would Mr. Peek say? Do go away." And she wrung her hands despairingly.

"Mr. Peek? I trust Mr. Peek would not venture to oppose his own cousin's—angel, I said, haughtily. "I accord him no such privilege."

"Oh! but he has, you know."

"Has what?"

"The privilege—the—the right. Oh, Mr. Paragraph, don't you know I've been engaged to Mr. Silas Peek for three months?"

I fell back flat among the flower-pots. When I picked myself up Wilhelmina had joined Silas Peek and his pals.

They had sold her for oil. Mr. Wickett had put his money into oil and added his daughter. Mr. Trumps and Mr. Bungales only wished that oilfarmers were Morsons, that they might give him their daughters also. They had sacrificed her, driven me to despair, and established "The Grand Peek's Farm Oil Company."

Next week she was married in Grace Church. Silas asked me to be his groomsman, and I, for the first time in our acquaintance, turned on him and cursed him as a "Yankee."

Who cared? They went on their tour (to the oil farm, I suppose) as merrily as though I had not uttered the vindictive words.

About three months afterward I remember to have read something in a paper about a celebrated divorce case. It appears that Mrs. Wilhelmina Peek had been in divers ways ill-used. Among other things expatiated upon by her lawyer were the facts that Mr. Silas Peek, having invested all her fortune in oil-lands, had insisted on establishing his residence upon the oil-farm, where it habitually rained gruesome; and, furthermore, had insisted on replenishing the castor-crusts with petroleum, and had forced the delicate Wilhelmina to partake thereof. I read the announcement with great gusto. I attended court daily throughout the suit. Yes, I have been avenged!

THE MYSTERY OF THE FLOATING JACKET.

EARLY in the beginning of 1860—the exact date unfortunately can not be supplied—an event occurred which disturbed and alarmed the inhabitants of the Island of Barbados. News had been taken some time in the spring of the year of the mysterious death of a black fisherman, who was, it is presumed, well known, since his disappearance from his dwelling-house when a negro murder (or was not a matter of importance) created considerable sensation in the parish to which he belonged, and, indeed, all over Barbados. It seemed impossible, however, notwithstanding that several people were deputed on special suspicion, to fix the guilt upon any body. The clothes of the murdered man—for the old man met with a violent death, if the testimony of the ground stooped in blood be any of any weight—were covered in a wood by some stray people, and were produced at a renewed committee of inquiry. But his jacket, which was a common knotted garment of the laborer man wear on some English coasts, was nowhere to be found; nor could the body of the ill-fated black be discovered, though enthusiastic a rigorous search in all directions. This mystery alone gave importance to the wretched negro's disappearance; but though involved it began to lose interest, and was giving a natural death, when, one morning, an inhabitant of St. Philip's parish staggered the local authorities by a report that the murdered man's jacket was floating in the middle of Tudor's Pond, which was inclosed in an estate hard by the main road, and in the centre of a field, through which it was approached by a narrow walk or foot-path.

A way rushed crowds of gaping blacks and whites to the spot; and there, sure enough, was to be seen, floating about in the middle of Tudor's Pond, a fisherman's blue jacket.

The news spread like fire among the canes (to use a local illustration), and in a short time a great crowd encompassed the pond. The authorities, roused by this fresh stimulus into a hope of obtaining some clew to the agent of the late murder, now appeared upon the scene, and only had time to see the jacket slowly sink and disappear. Drags were instantly employed, and, after some difficulty and loss of time, the jacket carrying, the drags were launched into the pond. After some hours of unavailing labor the boats were pulled up on the banks, and the crowd separated—full of surmises, suspicions, theories, and of hints at Obeah, the negro's point of support in all cases of mystery, however, was not to end here; for next day a large concourse assembled at the same time—between seven and twelve in the morning—to witness for the possible reappearance of the jacket. Punctually at twelve o'clock the blue garment rose to the surface of the pond. Horror now took the possession of the spectators; some ran for guns, and others for the governor. Down came the authorities, with due chief official. There was the jacket floating calmly. A boat was now put out by order of His Excellency the Governor, and its occupants rowed up to the mystery: the boat's crew, steerer and rearer—till a man in the bows cautiously extending his oar attempted to secure the jacket. Just as he touched it the point of resisting it dove in such like lead. The rowers bucked water a little and waited. The jacket, in a state of peace, rose again in the same spot. This time the man made a rush at it—but once more the thing disappeared before the oar could touch it. The governor now saw matters that, on its reappearance, the jacket should be fired at. Accordingly the crack shots awaited its rising, with their rifles fixed in their steerer and pointed at the spot in the centre of the pond. They were not disappointed—up came the jacket, and on the instant they fired a dozen balls and riddled it. The jacket, however, didn't sink: the water was white with the dashing of the bullets, and the object of their aim still floated agitatedly. It was not till they passed and the boat approached that it sank—but then it went down like a stone; and it was only this time that it ceased to rise on that day. The island was now in a ferment of doubts and fears: a terrible mere (there were none, it must be confessed, in the island at that time) shook their heads after vainly endeavoring to find a natural solution to this strange mystery. "It must be a hoax," they said aloud, but how a hoax could possibly be worked in the centre of a pond they could not divine. Again. Day after day, at twelve o'clock precisely, the goblin jacket rose to the surface of Tudor's Pond, and, day after day, eluded all efforts to secure it. The jacket itself was guarded and watched incessantly, and dr. gged thoroughly at intervals, but to no purpose—the best swimmers in the island (and they are, as it were, "to the manner born") endeavored to circumvent the delusive jacket, but were obliged to return to the shore baffled and exhausted. In vain, as it sank, did they dive after and s..ive to follow it to its retreat—panting and almost breathless they were compelled to come up again and rest, while the provoking jacket would slowly rise before them as if in scoffing. Visitors from various adjacent islands arrived—the best swimmers from Jamaica would try their respective skill, but fruitlessly.

Approaching the jacket as closely as possible, the swimmers would dash out from their boat appropriately upon the jacket, but they never succeeded in catching it. Day after day, and week after week, this went on in sight of the governor and other officials, and before thousands of spectators; and no one could "catch the jacket asleep," as it was said.

Gradually, however, the pond began to dry up and expectation was raised to its height.

Nothing, however, was discovered in the pond when all the water had evaporated under the severe drought—though it was dredged carefully, and when the rains refilled the basin the appearances entirely ceased.

No one as yet has accounted in any way satisfactorily for this startling occurrence, though one or two theories were broached from time to time—one of which (suggested to the writer of this paper) was to the effect that some fish had got entangled in the jackets—which might have been thrown into the pond by the supposed murderer—and so in its struggles to escape, and for fresh air, have dragged the jacket to the surface of the pond. This is fair enough, so far as the mere rising of the jacket and its elusive pursuit are concerned, but how was it that it rose and sank at precise intervals? and how was it that no traces were discovered when the pond was dredged and dragged? Furthermore, is it likely that out of the hundreds of bullets actually fired into the jacket, not one succeeded in killing this entangled fish?

THE MILLER.

MERRILY rolls the mill stream on,
Merrily goes the mill,
And merry we might shall be my song
As ever the guy lark's trill.
While the mill stream shall flow, and the mill shall go,
And his garners are bravely stored,
Come all who will, there's a welcome still
At the jovial miller's board.

Well may the miller's heart be light,
Well may his song be gay,
For the rich man's smile, and the poor man's prayer
Have been his for many a day.
And they have been the name of the miller's dame
In cots where the lowly mourn,
For want and woe at her presence go,
And joy and peace return.

Fair is the miller's daughter too,
With her locks of golden hair,
With her laughing eye and her sunny brow,
Still better is she than fair.
She has listened to all, with her winning smile,
And if ever his heart is sad,
Let her sing the song he has loved so long,
And the miller's heart is glad.

"ALL'S WELL THAT ENDS WELL."

LAST summer, while staying for bathing at a little sea-port town on the coast of Caen, I made the acquaintance of Father Moneeau, professor of swimming. This man was a miser, whose avarice was notorious. He lived on black bread and the refuse of fish which he himself caught; he drank nothing but water, which in that part of the country cost nothing; and his garments were always of the coarsest and commonest description, and patched, besides, in a dozen places. And yet his means must have been, at the least, easy, to judge from the profits of his various trades. Over the day, entering the salle-à-manger of my hotel, the Soleil-Levant, I observed a young girl of seventeen or eighteen, sitting working at a window. She raised her eyes on my entrance, then dropped them, and continued her work, without further noticing my presence. I was, however, that she was very pretty, with regular and delicate features. On inquiring of my hostess, I found that she was the daughter of Moneeau. "And the true child of her father," added Mme. A. "You see how she is dressed. Look at her clothes; and yet she is always at work, and earns more than enough to maintain her and even well."

"The avarice of Father Moneeau is detestable enough," returned I; "but in such a young girl it is repulsive."

On entering my room I found there a letter from one of my friends, Ernest Préaux, who resided in the neighboring town. Hearing that I was not far off, he had written begging me to come to him, that we might renew our old friendship. It was a strange nature, that of Ernest Préaux. At five-and-twenty he had the manners of a cold and austere monsieur of forty. He was clever; had read much and mixed much. When he had left college together, and had afterward met again, I found him, he of law, I of medicine. He seemed pleased that we should be at once on our old familiar footing together, but he preserved his habitual calmness and taciturnity. I fancy that the extreme sobriousness of his character was in part owing to a disappointment he had met with. A young girl to whom he had been engaged had deserted him and given her hand to another. Her perfidy had made a misogynist of him; he was so young, so inexperienced; and he had now become utterly skeptical with regard to woman and woman's constancy. Another circumstance had also, perhaps, helped to make him what he was. He had lost his parents at ten years of age. They had both died of gifted malady, by seeing the honor of their house imperilled. His father had been robbed of a considerable sum, and had immediately been declared bankrupt, the suddenness and shame of this brought on an attack of apoplexy, to which he succumbed. The mother, who had been in delicate health, was unable to bear up against so many misfortunes, and in a week followed her husband to the grave. Then came all the long and weary business of liquidation, at the end of which the poor little orphan was found to be the inheritor of the modest annual income of 600 francs. His prospects as regards education, therefore, would have been of the scantiest, but that his guardian one day received, on his account, the sum of 1500 francs, together with a letter of a few words, bearing no signature, stating that the same amount would be paid annually on that day to the son of M. Préaux.

The next day I proceeded to the house of Ernest's former guardian, with whom he was passing his holiday. He received me most cordially.

"I wanted particularly to see you again," said he, "for a few months later I shall be unable to do so."

"Why?" said I.

"Because I intend to become a Trappe," he answered.

"My dear Ernest," said I, "I am perfectly aware of your capacity for silence, and it is a precious gift in monasteries; but I love not monasteries in violent onslaughts; you used to make against a monastic life."

"I was wrong," replied Ernest. "At any rate, right or wrong, I feel now that I require calm and solitude. I want to try and deaden my heart. I must forget. This is why I intend to turn Trappist. There are philosophers who cry up memory as the essential base of all intelligence. It is possible; but it is sometimes a very sad gift. To remember is to suffer, either in the past, present, or future. Better at once to forget."

"Come," said I, "I see you are not yet yourself. In love's affairs the only cure is indifference: you are at present only at Despair."

"You are wrong," replied Ernest. "I have thorough contempt for the person you allude to; I detest all women, and that one in particular."

I usually paid my visit to Ernest between eight and nine in the morning, but I found several times that he had risen very early and had already had a long walk when I got there. I proposed, therefore, to go earlier, that I might be his companion on those occasions; but he answered me evasively, and in such a manner that I at once fancied he had a secret connected with these excursions. Although his reserve pained me somewhat, it was obvious alone that discovered to me the reason for it. One morning I arrived at his house a little earlier than usual, but he had already left; and on walking out I met him, within gunshot, crossing the fields. I hurried after him, but before I could reach him he had disappeared into a little thickly wooded shaft with trees. "Ah!" thought I, "now I shall catch him by the fact." I entered the shade. What were my astonishment to discover in my friend's companion, Ursule, the daughter of Father Moneeau! Now I have a horror of "peeping Toms," and remembered the abuse lavished by Ernest upon women and the prudish airs of Mlle. Ursule, I drew back thoroughly indignant at discovering so low a school, determined from this day to cease my visits to Ernest, and I held to my resolve. But a few days after another little circumstance occurred which increased my dislike of Ursule. In the morning, after bathing, I had strolled to Father Moneeau's cottage, not having seen him on the sands. He was a capital swimmer, and, in his professional capacity, I had met with more than one of his pupils. I found the door I saw Ursule with an old stocking in her hand filled with sous. Directly she caught sight of me she endeavored to hide it, but ineffectually. "So," cried I, "you are rich?"

"Oh no, Monsieur!" she answered.

"But your purse?" said I; "be well filled," returned I.

"What purse?" replied Ursule.

"That stocking that you had in your hand just now," I answered.

"There was nothing in it," said the girl.

The lie and the avarice of one so young seemed to me monstrous.

A short time after this occurrence, Father Moneeau came to me, as a doctor, to beg me to go and see his daughter, who was ill, not forgetting, by a sinister hint and insinuation, to let me know that it was not my intention to demand a fee on the occasion. I found Ursule really very ill; she required the greatest care. I told her father this, and wrote a prescription.

"Will these drugs cost much?" he asked, anxiously.

"Only two or three francs," I answered.

"Three francs!" he echoed; "and where is a poor man like me to get three francs? and, besides, will that cure her?"

"Probably not," replied I.

"Then I shall have to buy more? Oh! I shall be ruined, ruined!"

"If you wish to save your daughter," said I, severely, "spare nothing; the case is serious."

I left indignant, but returned in the evening, fearing that he might not have sought any assistance. The door of the cabin was open, a fact which indicated great confusion in the domestic arrangements. Entering the kitchen, and was about to go into Ursule's room, when I saw a light shining through the door—which was a little ajar—of her father's chamber. On advancing to call him, I saw him standing before a cupboard, on the shelves of which glittered piles of louis and five-franc pieces. He was so engrossed in counting his riches that he did not hear me. I retreated, and then called him. Then I heard him double-lock the cupboard, and then he appeared in the kitchen, with a decided and resolute look about him.

"Doctor," said he, "people do very well at the hospital, do they not?"

"Yes," I answered; "but people are better at home."

"No doubt, when they are well off," returned Moneeau. "But I have an idea, doctor, that Ursule would be well taken care of at the hospital. They tell me that patients want for nothing; that they have good chicken-broth, and wine if necessary."

"Certainly, it is true."

"Then I shall decide to take my daughter to Pont-L'Evêque."

"You must remember that she can not walk, and is not in a state to bear the motion of a carriage," answered I.

"My good doctor, I will take her in a litter; two of the neighbors will help me."

"It is a good five miles from here to Pont-L'Evêque," I observed.

"No matter; we can stop and rest."

More than a year had passed, and I had nearly forgotten this disagreeable affair, when I was one day called on to be present at an examination of young girls who were being brought up as teachers. The ceremony was an interesting one to me, as the fate of a goddchild of mine was then to be decided. Among these young girls was a face that puzzled me dreadfully. It seemed to me to belong to Ursule; but it was Ursule transformed, bearing the trace of her severe vices, but always delicate and refined features.lit up with the brilliant flush of excitement. Her bearing was graceful, and, which was still more extraordinary, she was in a charming toilet. She trembled a little in answering the examiners, but her answers were correct, and she obtained her diploma as governess. My god-daughter was not less fortunate. I had seen her talking to Ursule, and I was eager to question her, hoping that she might enlighten me as to the transformation of the avaricious and apparently ignorant country girl into the elegant and well-educated young lady.

"Mlle. Moneeau," answered my god-daughter, "has been in my family two months, and she only came to stay until the examination, for she knew more than any of us. They say that she is quite a prodigy in the school."

This was all I could obtain, and I was very curious on the subject. But I knew that Ernest Préaux was at Caen, and resolved to see him, hoping that he could give me the answer to this enigma. I found him more moody than ever.

"Sit down," said he.

"No," replied I. "Your manner makes me think you are wishing me a hundred miles away; so good-by!"

"Nonsense," returned Ernest. "I assure you your visit gives me much pleasure, the more so as it may be the last."

"Thank you for the compliment," replied I.

"There is no compliment," he rejoined. "You must know, then, that I am thoroughly decided to enter La Trappe."

"Ah, bravo!" said I. "But your decision does not disturb me much. I know now your peculiar way of turning mouth."

"You may laugh, but I am more than ever resolved."

"From your manner of saying that," replied I, "one would imagine that you had fresh motives for quitting the world—that Ineichle Babylon in which virtue has but one asylum—a cabin embowered in trees, etc., etc."

Ernest slightly colored, and his eye sparkled; but he kept down. However, I was determined to make him speak.

"Is it long since you saw Mlle. Ursule?" I asked.

Ernest lifted his head and quickly answered, "Ah! then you have guessed my secret; and that little wretch can keep me in the world. Oh, women, women!"

"What! is this one also incontant?"

"Do not calumniate her," he returned; "she is an angel."

"I must believe you, certainly," rejoined I; "for you ought to be a judge of angels, as you are having had so many opportunities of making her acquaintance in the aforesaid cabin embowered in trees."

"What! you know?" he exclaimed, with astonishment. "But you know I was obliged to think of Ursule's reputation. People would have thought all sorts of harm if I had not married her, and married her so carefully."

"Certainly, you behaved like a gallant man, as well as a man of gallantry," I answered.

"Don't laugh, and do not judge me unfairly," he returned. "I assure you that my object was not to ruin a poor girl who had been my friend's mistress, but to save her."

"Your reason, at all events, could not be more moral," said I, laughing.

"I see you doubt my sincerity," said Ernest, sadly, after a moment's pause of reflection. "But listen, and I will tell you all about it. You may know, I love Ursule with all my heart, but she has not the least idea of it. She herself loves another, and will, no doubt, shortly be married. But I will begin at the beginning. One day—some few years ago—I was walking on the beach when a little girl of thirteen or fourteen advanced toward me. She appeared nervous and hesitating, and perfectly said, in a little voice, 'Monsieur Ernest, do you not recognize me?' I am little Ursule, don't you remember? She was the daughter of a fisherman. I did remember, but with a certain feeling of displeasure, which at the moment I could not master. I had passed from my childhood to my manhood without a little share in the rain of my father. However, Ursule began to talk to me of old times, and appeared to remember every little kindness I might have shown her as a child with so much joy and gratitude that my heart was ingratiatingly touched, and I soon found myself talking to her as affectionately as of old. From this time I often met her, and gradually learned the whole of her almost as a brother. I found that she had very romantic notions, balanced, however, by strict right-mindedness. A year or so had passed, when she one day confided to me something that may surprise you, skeptic, but which did not astonish me, for her character was a singular mélange of boldness and simplicity. She told me that her father, who was extremely avaricious, was opposed to her attempting to educate herself. 'He is poor,' said she, 'and says that I must work for my bread, and not waste my time in studying.' 'But why,' I answered, 'do you desire so much to be learned?' I was bewitched a moment, and she replied: 'Because I love some one—some one who would blush to be the husband of an ignorant girl like me. So I want to improve myself, and to study to become a governess. Then, perhaps, he will be touched by what I have done, and will marry me.' From this day I began to teach Ursule, who made astonishing progress. She has the courage of a heroine. Every morning she used to go to the little cabin, and there I met her, and did my best in helping the development of her mind. During the day she worked hard at her needle, in order to gather together a little sum for her marriage portion. I endeavored to make her accept my gift; but she was resolute in refusing. 'I must make my own position myself,' said she. 'I hope he will like me the better for it.' And so he will. I love her sincerely. She has every good quality but gratitude. Would you believe that since the lessons have ceased I have not heard a word of her?"

Ernest's voice trembled as he spoke. At this moment a ring at the bell was heard—a timid, hesitating, undecided ring. "It is she!" he cried, jumping up; and he pushed me into the adjoining room with an energy of which I should have thought my future Trappist incapable. He went to open the door, and then I heard the sweet voice of Ursule murmuring thanks. I closed the door, gently, or, if he did, it was in so low a tone that I was unable to catch what he said. Ursule was the first to break the silence that ensued. In these circumstances generally appear to be bolder than men, in reality because they are more timid.

"Monsieur Ernest," said Ursule, "you appear to be ill. It grieves me to see you so, now that I am so pleased at having succeeded."

"At all events you are happy, Ursule," murmured Ernest, hardly knowing what he said.

"Happy!" she cried, "not yet, monsieur."

"And he?" said Ernest, after a pause.

"Oh!" returned she, "I begin to be afraid that, after all, he may not care altogether for me."

"Is it possible?" cried Ernest, almost joyfully.

"But you have not told me, Monsieur Ernest, why you are sad," said Ursule.

"Oh! as to me, I love an ungrateful girl, who, in her turn, loves some one else!" answered Ernest.

"Is it possible?" this time cried Ursule. "And who is this person who might be so happy, Monsieur Ernest?"

"What does it matter? what do you care about it, since I am not the one you love? And, in my turn, may I ask you who is this man who disdains your affection?" said Ernest.

"And suppose I answer, also, What does it matter? what can you care about it, since I am not the woman you love?" replied Ursule.

This kind of declaration is, perhaps, as good as any. Ernest knew it was true, fell down at the feet of Ursule, and covered her hands with kisses. The poor girl herself was crying for joy. I was on the point of entering my hiding-place, when my situation began to be rather ridiculous, when a ring at the bell was heard—this time a violent and energetic one. At the moment I recognized my visitor. "Ah, doctor! I am glad you are here; for I am come to clear my character." And as he spoke he took from his pocket and put on his large old-fashioned greasy pocket-book; then from another he drew a packet containing his bank-notes, and coolly proceeded to wipe his forehead. I was certainly deceived in imagining him to be angry. His face presently became radiant as he said, "And the good doctor, too, who thinks me an old miser! Poor body else did. But listen, Monsieur Ernest, doctor, my child, every one! You know that I owe to Ernest M. Préaux, the father of Ernest, a debt of honor and every confidence in me, although he was aware that I had an unfortunate propensity to drink. However, as I was steady enough in the business of sale, only indulged in my wretched taste when work was over, my employer kept me, and contented himself with occasional remonstrances. But I was about to be devoted to him, as I was—I swear it! One day M. Préaux sent me to receive money for him, and according I was five o'clock. I was returning home with a large sum in my pocket-book, when, on passing a cabaret, I felt a thirst which I attempted to rise of entering and taking a glass of something and a crust; it is true that I was ready to drop from fatigue after my day's excursion. I had not finished a moment with two comrades with whom I was often in the habit of drinking. Chatting now with them and drinking with them, I lost myself in the wood, and fell asleep, utterly forgetful of the money which was in my care. When I awoke, some hours later, my pocket-book was gone. What was I to do? You know the rest, Monsieur Ernest. Your father was ruined, and through me. But I swear to you I had no regard or fault as much as was in my power. I have ever year saved enough from my earnings to send you the annual sum of twelve hundred francs, and to-day I come to bring you, thank God, the sum of a hundred thousand francs, the result of a very fortunate investment in the funds, added to a ship-owner at Cherbourg, a very honest man, who did his best for me: and now, on my knees, Monsieur Ernest, I beg the pardon I have asked." Ernest hastened to embrace the old fisherman, who was about to prostrate himself at his feet, but was easily able to utter a word. He could only point to Ursule, whom her father had almost disregarded until then. Suddenly, however, he turned to her, and said, "Ursule, my child, how is it I find you here?"

Ursule looked imploringly at Ernest.

"We wished to see you," said Ernest, to Father Moneeau, "to beg your consent to our marriage."

"To your marriage! What! you love each other?" exclaimed the old man, joyfully.

"Yes; we have loved each other for four years," replied Ernest.

"And I knew nothing about it," said the father.

"We did not know it ourselves," rejoined Ernest.

Father Moneeau appeared to gather very little from these answers; but, as it is sometimes not necessary to understand in order to give happiness, he seemed to be satisfied; and after having embraced Ursule Moneeau, in the prettiest of bridal toilets, he consented to the happy and radiant Ernest.

PATTY'S VOCATION.

I.

OUR village is a very pretty one. It nestles in a valley, which valley is crowned with hills—mountains, I may say, of every form and height. Round shouldering hills, covered with a patchwork of fields, and dotted with farm-houses and barns, lead up to slopes of plantations and oak copses, which are again surmounted by the purple-clothed grouse hills. A broad and very beautiful river makes a turn through the valley, enriching and gladdening it. This river is our pride and boast. Part of the village is on one side, part on the other. The two are connected by an old-fashioned substantial wooden bridge, which is never without a passenger on it.

Our modest little house looks down from a tiny eminence on this bridge. Opposite to us, on the other side of the river, is the grand residence of the squire. But as to forms, the letter H, and one side matches the other side: which to my mind is very ridiculous. The Hall is so large, and so conspicuous, and has such big windows, that we can almost see every thing that goes on there. But the squire can only just perceive the gable end of our cottage, through the trees, so, as I say to Robert, "We have something that the squire has not."

"Don't be envious of the squire, Patty. I have got something more that he has not, and that is a good wife."

Now, to be sure, it was a nd thing, not only for himself but for all the world about us, that the squire was unmarried. It would make such a difference to the poor, as well as to the rich, if he were married. All the world, and especially the bridge, through the myrtle.

One day I saw two strangers loiter on the bridge: an old man and a young girl. The old man had a supporting arm of the girl, and crossed feebly to the other side of the bridge; she was dropping the petals of a rose into the river, and watching them float away. At that moment on to the bridge dashed the squire's carriage.

How it did not break and quiet men have impetuous and haughty servants? When we dined at the Hall the servants gave us the impression that the thing short of their master's absolute commands made them take the trouble of handing us any thing.

Thus, the coachman, adopting the habit of the rest, was accustomed to drive his master with a reckless defiance of the idea of the possibility of the road being required for any other person. He scared the villagers fly before it. And in a moment, before the young girl could turn round, the carriage had knocked down and driven over the old man.

I rushed down to the bridge without any shawl or bonnet. When I got there the squire's carriage had stopped, and the squire was assisting the young girl to help the old gentleman up.

Without her being pretty there was something so sweet, so modest, so wonderfully tender, in the young girl's manner as she moved and spoke, that I was instantly taken by her.

By a great effort the old man seemed not dangerously hurt; that is, he was quite sensible, and able to walk; but the girl that she might suffer fear. But his leg was broken. That we all saw at once. He was a traveler, merely passing through the country. Where was he to go? To the inn? How we do with him? The village inn was by no means good enough. The squire seemed to have forgotten he had a house, and I offered our house.

The squire jumped at the idea; he called his carriage, bade his imperious footman help him to place the old gentleman in it, and walked himself by the head of his imperious horses, as if that were the only way to make his imperious coachman drive at a foot pace.

We soon reached the cottage. There all these imperious people had to wait, after sending for Dr. Leech, then for Mr. Bplendon to assist Dr. Leech, until the old gentleman was not only safe in bed, but had expressed himself as "comfortable," etc. precisely comfortable" which was as much as one could expect from a person with a broken leg. Finally, peaceably at the idea they would not be any more polluted by doing any other business than that of their master, the imperious horses and servants were all ordered off to the neighboring town, and desired to transpose themselves into mere carriers of baggage (and that on their master's), and bring back the baggage of the old gentleman and the young lady.

Now, with having so much to do, I was wholly forgetful of Robert's feelings on the matter. Not until dinner was over, and the young lady had gone up to see if the old gentleman was still continuing "comfortable," did I recollect to say, "My goodness me, Robert, to think of my having done such a thing without your leave!"

"I do not know what you have done; but I know that is the prettiest girl I ever saw."

"Now, Robert!"

Robert did not often praise people. If he did, it was in a roundabout away.

"Robert, she is a French girl."

"And why should'n a French girl be pretty?"

"You know she is not pretty." N.B. I wonder if I was jealous? However, if I was, that was my first and last twinge. I began to see directly what Robert meant by her being so pretty. She had such sweet ways. She beamed over with goodness, and though she spoke English wonderfully well, astonishingly well—she had a way of placing her words that made every thing she said piquante and durable. Thus, when I wished her good-night, she had so engaged my heart that I gave her a kiss.

"Ah!" she said, returning it, "that is a thing of you as good." I am no more strange, but a little friend ever to be."

So I was obliged to kiss her again. When we met in the morning she offered her cheek at once, saying:

"Good-morrow, dear friend."

"Patty," said Robert to me, "the squire is in love!"

"My goodness me, Robert, how you startle me! With whom?"

"With Pet."

"How, Robert!"

Pet was our name for the sweet girl. Her real name was Frances du Chaine. Her mother was an English woman, married to the old gentleman driven over by the squire's imperious servants and horses. He called her Fanny. That was too prosaic a name for us. We kept with Fanny, but soon got to Pet.

"The squire in love with Pet! As if I should not have seen that before you, Robert!"

"Perhaps you ought to have done so—perhaps you would have done so, had he not confided his love to me."

"My dear Robert. Such a splendid match! And the dear child was going to be a governess."

"Not now, Patty—not now. The squire is love the first day, and wanted to propose on the bridge—"

"Now, Robert!—"

"—and every day since; but he does not know how to do it, she is so reserved and shy to him."

"My goodness me, Robert, but that must be altered. I must go to her. I must see her. Oh, my dear Robert, what a fortunate thing was that accident!"

"We don't know yet. Perhaps Pet will not accept the squire."

A fear seemed to rise in my heart, for indeed she seemed to have an antipathy to men, such as some folks have to cats. Only lately had she begun to find out that Robert had nothing obnoxious about him.

"Your Robert," she had said to me, "is good. Oh, I like good. He is like a woman."

Perhaps Robert might not have thought this a compliment, and for fear he should not I did not tell him of it.

But at all events, Pet having accorded him her affection, now gave him such abundant proofs of it that no one more thought her the prettiest girl he had ever seen.

"You must go and break the matter to her, Patty."

"Oh no, Robert; let the squire tell her himself."

"But she will not give him the opportunity."

"I'll talk to come this evening, and I'll see him sitting in the veranda. I will so place Pet as that she shall have her back to the bridge, but I shall be able to see. And when I have him coming, and just as I know his hand is on the wicket of our garden gate I will make a pretence to go for something, and he will just have time to say, 'Such a splendid match!'"

Robert approving of my plan, all was executed most delightfully; except that the squire, more nervous than ever through anxiety, sped up the hill so quickly after I had left him on the bridge, that my little manœuvre, and he was so astonished to see me that he tumbled over my workbasket, and, altogether, made an ignominious rather than a pleasing entry.

However, I made a dash after one of my balls of wool as it went down the lawn, and slipped round in by the back way, fervently praying the good fates to attend the squire, and having great misgivings that they would not.

It seems that he did not do amiss. He expressed himself in a manly, honorable manner.

He confessed that he loved her, and did not know him enough.

He would wait until she knew him better.

She thought very well of him then, because he was so kind to grandpapa.

She could not have affection such as should be a wife's all in a moment, he hurry.

He would wait—weeks, months, years.

No; she would not have him wait. She was not in love with a wife's duties. She knew nothing of men and their ways, and was not of a mind to try the wife can.

"I must not force myself upon you," said the squire. "I will leave you with this last remark: I love you, and I shall never love any other woman."

"My goodness me! To think of her resisting that, and then the squire too. Robert, he does not know what she is refusing."

"No, she does not, Patty; you must talk to her."

Talk to her! the whole parish talked to her. Her grandfather, generally strong and well, talked to her until he had tears in his eyes.

"Child," he said, "you must not think only of yourself. Remember the benefit to your family. So kind and good a man will doubtless make your brothers and sisters his own. I am old; soon, probably, I shall be a heavier burden on your poor mother than the youngest of her children. Who is to take care of you all?"

"It is not right, grandpapa, to marry a man for that."

"It is not," he answered; "but you are thoughtless. What more can you require in a husband than what is now offered you?"

"He is a man so tall—I love not men so tall."

Grandpapa spoke to the winds. This little wild innocent creature could think of nothing but flowers, and pets, and child's things. The squire wooed in vain, and my heart bled for him.

"Oh, Robert, what are we to do? If she was only Sarah Jane for five minutes—if she was only me!"

"What! You would commit bigamy and marry the squire?"

"It distresses me so to see him, Robert. He was very thin before, and so awkward, but now he is a wilting-stick. Pray, Robert, don't worry me with ridiculous ideas. I am miserable enough as it is, and old Mr. Hamilton declares he is well enough to go home."

"I think so too; I do not wish to seem inhospitable; I wish no one to think me unreasonable; but I own I look forward to having my cottage and my wife once more to myself with a vast deal of pleasure."

"How can you be so unfeeling, Robert; you don't think of what will happen if they go away. The squire will never see Pet again, and we shall have no lady at the Hall."

"Hah! Now a light strikes on me. We are not wholly actuated by love of the squire, we think a little of ourselves."

"Get away with you, Robert; no one being by, I may tell you you are most provoking."

And Pet and her father did go away, and the squire was left forlorn.

But Sir Robert was properly punished for his want of sympathy; for the poor squire was up at our house morning, noon, and night. He came in the morning to ask if I had heard from her. He came at noon to talk about her, and he came at night to ask me if I had written to her. Hitherto I have presented no advice to public view as a man possessing negative qualities or virtues. Yet I am happy to say he was not so wholly different from other men as not to be without some negative popularity or virtue. He wrote the best hand and the best letter that any man could write.

Remembering this, I was happily hit upon the idea that he should begin a correspondence with Pet, sending the first letter under cover to her grandfather. I dictated to the squire's letter, but merely a chatty, amusing, friendly letter.

"And will she write the return!" thought I, as he started up on this proposal like a magic figure of fame, anxiously on the look-out for a hot loaf from the oven. "How can he write any thing amusing or chatty!"

But he did. And he brought me the letter to read.

Well, Pet did not answer the letter for days. I thought the poor squire would vanish into thin air. But, after he had written six letters at least, he received one in return.

There was a solemn joy in his face as he appeared with the letter closely buttoned up in the inner breast-pocket of his coat. He drew it forth, as a man might draw forth a treasure that no one else ever possessed or ever would possess.

"It is short," he said, as he handed it to me, at the same time giving a little chuckle that you might suppose a child would give over a box of sugar-plums. Poor dear squire!—as I said of Robert.

It was, in fact, a very short, and not a very affectionate letter, but very grateful. And when dogs grateful pugs, and my mamma, and they both say, so much of an answer to your letters."

"How nice of her to conclude so, Patty!" murmured the squire, as I finished reading the letter.

My goodness me! To think of the squire, in the transports of his happiness, calling me "Patty." What would Robert say? What would every body say? The proud and imperious squire! He turned scarlet.

But I had to tell him what I thought of the conclusion of Pet's note. Should I call him by his Christian name? Or was the idea brought on by our sences. It was a pretty name—Oliver. The surname, of course, I dare not tell here for my life. But it was only a pet name, which was the proper thing to go with a Christian name of three. But to go on with the discussion of Pet's letter. I must confess I saw nothing in this scrap of writing from beginning to end, conclusion and all, that warranted any one having the slightest excited about it. And when I heard that her grandfather had insisted, and her mother commanded, and both stood over her, and one on each side of her, before the letter could be written, I was more than ever puzzled what to say. But of course the squire never knew what trouble I gave those loud her before he got his long-expected letter.

"My dear Patty," exclaimed the squire, quite timidly, "will you be my answer me?"

His dear Patty! As if I was his sister! Well, to be sure! But I was already so scarlet I could not become more so.

So, as I can do on great occasions, I collected myself, and assuming a confidential and sisterly air, said,

"I do think she wishes to be friendly, putting Pet instead of Frances du Chaine."

"That is just it, Patty; exactly what I feel. If she had desired to put me down altogeth r—to snub me altogether—she could have put Pet." And again the squire gave that foolish little feminine chuckle. "I have great hopes," he continued, "that she will make her new duties. I have been in the neighborhood, and have made inquiries, and, from all I can learn, the people she is going to are not at all refined. They will not suit her ideas at all, she is so essentially a lady."

Think of our shy, awkward, proud squire talking in this fashion. I was beginning quite to love him.

Certainly, as the squire said, her new duties did not agree with her. She came to us to spend her first holidays with a bad cold and cough, and was very thin and white. But she was as saucy as ever, and regarded the squire and all his devoted attentions as if she had been a young princess and he the page appointed to run by her stirrup.

One day he asked to speak to me alone.

"Tell her, Patty," said he, "that I am going away. I see my presence is irksome to her. It is necessary that she should have rest and quiet before she returns to governessing. I think she will be happier, and will soon regain her former strength and spirits, if she is left only with you and Robert. Go and tell her so. I shall try to make myself happy with the recollection of her thanks."

So good and unselfish of the squire!

I gave his message, with a little spice of my own added.

I was delighted to see that she was more astonished than pleased.

"Dear squire!" she exclaimed. "Why for? I am not too teased. I think not of him."

"Shall I tell him to stay, Pet?"

"No. You are of all Pattys the most naughty. I give no message; I say nothing; I am as one who has not had the least of a message. Why do he and me have messages? We are free of each other."

Common man. I was afraid to write and tell him. Moreover, one day, when going over the Hall, to which we had free admittance, and that without the servants knowing of the servants, if Pet did not throw herself down upon one of the blue satin covered chairs, on which I never dared to sit down except I had on my best gown, and say, "Ah, Patty, would you like to see fine lady? Look at me. I know all the airs. I have in me a doting old Henry, and I have been educated, and I have a wish to be gracious and dignified. See this courtesy that I make you. And if you were not much to my liking I would be haughty, Patty."

She airs the child gave herself!

"Do not look at me so, my best Patty, all ever-mannish intended to be. You are farmer's wife, yet the prettiest lady and sweetest friend. Why not little governess like me? I feel lady ways. I like that one, sometimes, that is not ever to be ours."

"Ever, child!" I exclaimed, significantly.

Pet blushed—positively blushed—and made no answer.

That evening I had a serious talk with Pet.

"Child," said I, very severely, for I was a very aggravating, provoking, good-for-nothing sort of a thing. Why not love so good a man—so respectable a man, Pet? I declare I love him almost as much as if he was Robert."

She flushed up, evidently pleased.

"But—but—yes—he is good—more—and he is—"

"Well?"

"He is not bad; but he is man."

"You can not marry a woman."

"I not marry him. Why will he be friend, the great friend, dear friend?" And as she said this she was more scarlet than ever I was in all my life.

"She must love him," I thought, and rushed again to the charge. "You must marry him, Pet. Think how happy you will make us; how you will delight your grandfather; how happy your—"

"Hush! hush! Was ever so bad a Patty? A girl marries because she loves, not for riches and grands."

"To be sure; so she ought."

"And he—he—de you think that he must be married for that? Is his wife's friend, a? I think more of him than you; oh so foolish Patty!"

"You do, indeed, Pet. The poor dear grandpapa spoke ought to be provided for himself. And can't you love him?"

"I have much love, great respect—so much, that if he was not the squire, so rich, so great, I should say I ten love, but not marry."

"But why not marry, supposing the squire became poor?"

"I love not marrying." And she blushed deeper and deeper.

"Why?" I asked, all curious and anxious.

She put her rosy lips to my ear, whispered something, and then sprang away, laughing with all her might.

"What a ridiculous creature! Why I no more minded—indeed I was quite anxious—but how am I to tell it here? Why, I will kissed me, and then I should Robert laughed heartily, and, says he: 'If Pet objects to being kissed by the squire when she accepts him, we will get him to forego the ceremony.'

That was her whisper.

Such a ridiculous idea! What could have put it into her head? To be sure, when Robert told me he was going to marry me, I did not think it at all a certain fact until he had kissed me, and then I knew that for evermore I was his and he mine.

"Come, don't cry about it," said Robert. "One thing is pretty certain to me: if Pet refuses the squire because she has an objection to being kissed by him, I will bet you fifty pounds she ends in marrying him."

I never was so perplexed. I was in such a state that I really was quite elated—not glad when Pet's time was up, and she had to go back to her governessing.

II.

SUCH a ridiculous idea!

I kept saying this to myself as soon as ever I saw the squire again; for, though he was very tall and a little grim-visaged, yet he had a handsome mouth, very fine teeth, and—in short, one might be saluted by moonlight with a warm.

Indeed, the squire was improving vastly. Now he had not only a fashionable collar, but absolutely one of those little ties that Robert says are meant for grasshoppers, not men; in short, the squire not only looked fashionable and well got up, but also seemed to feel quite a comfort in the change. Being obliged to face the world boldly, now that there was not a fraction of collar to creep behind, he did so resolutely. And his confidence—upon my word, his confidence about Pet's loving him at last beat Robert's all to nothing.

"My goodness me, Robert, if he is disappointed after all!" said I to Robert, behind our bed-curtains one night.

"Wait until he is, Patty."

"But I feel for him so, poor fellow! and he is going to paper and paint, and new-furnish the house, and alter the stables, and put in a bow-window to the summer drawing-room—and suppose he does it all for nothing! However, it will amuse him, I hope, and make the time pass."

As the months glided away, I must confess that if ever a woman did her best to make another welcome—if ever a man's visit was a real treat to a visit—it was I and Robert to Mr. Dyer. Yet Poets upon sheets of all my private ideas; and Pet's letters began to pour in almost daily, and were full of questions; and it was astonishing how all these questions had reference to the squire. I describe the rooms, describe the thousand odd questions in Pet's letters.

Never shall I forget my amazement, when one day, just outside the sight of the bridge, as I ran by the staircase window, I perceived an extraordinary figure, without a hat, and with coat-tails flying, striding over the bridge, as if he had seven-leagued boots; and before I could take breath, there was the squire thundering at the cottage door.

"She accepts me!" he exclaimed, as he burst into the house, and threw me a letter.

Such a letter! as if that letter I do not like to say much. It was totally and entirely different from any thing like what Sarah Jane would have written. If I had been the squire, I should not have considered it at all the sort of letter to receive upon such an occasion.

"Robert," I said solemnly to him, on telling him what was in the letter, "she does not love him, she only marries him because we have persuaded her. And he has found out how to ask her love."

"Then do it, Patty; and when she comes whip her: if you do not I will."

When she arrived, if Robert did not pet her, and coax her, and humor her, until I was so bewildered that I quite forgot to order dinner one day, and kept putting my balls of wool (I am always knitting) under the clocking hen instead of her own eggs, which I only found out when the eggs would not lie on the floor one day for my work-basket. Such a lovely fitting, and all from my gay Darking! However, it must allow that Pet required petting, for she was as pale as a clean shirt, and as thin as Robert's old-set stockings, which it is of no use to mend any more.

As for her spirits, she had none. No more chatterations, no more seeing of great ladies; she was as dumb as any lay-sister.

It was just what I thought. She was going to marry the squire, and she did not think she loved him.

"At this moment, oh! best Patty, I have a shudder of marrying."

"Then don't do it."

"But I will."

"You naughty Pet, the squire is far too good for you. He worships you, and he has a most tender heart, and you will break it, if you marry him and do not love him."

"Now that this, Patty. He writes to me; he says he loves me, and me only; never before, since, or again, will he love. I think this good; I think that, it makes me see he is not like other men; so I am interested. Then he says in his letter, that I am not to forget and to love him, or I will die of him at all. I am to live always for now, as if we had never met. He will not ever come in my sight, because he can not come, but that he will always wish I was his wife. So he says 'Adieu' finally. Now, Patty, what do you think I find? Quite a heart, running all over my cheeks. I say, 'What are these tears? Are you sorry, you bad girl?' And the answer is, 'I am sorry.' So then I write and say, I like not that either; and when the answers come to my letter, it is himself. Then I say nothing, but that I will write once more, and that I do, and I am this bad girl. I have said I will marry, and I like not to marry."

"Let me write to the squire; let me break it off; it will be utter misery to you both if you marry."

"Why misery?" says she, hotly.

To be sure, there was no understanding the girl.

And what a martyr she looked, on her weddingday. Of course Robert and I went to the wedding, and I always put on my knees to beg her to let me break it off, even the very day before.

How the squire got through the time of his courtship without a strait-waist to hang or drown himself, or to hate her, and break with her, I do not know. She was more cross-grained and cantankerous than our brindled cat, which we were at last obliged to sell, though she was the best milker we ever had. Fourteen pints of cream twice—I say twice—spurning Pet's wedding-day. She was married, and if the squire had married a statue she could not have been more silent. And the squire behaved like an angel, even if he did not look like one.

"I shall take her far away from you all," says he to Robert. "Change by degrees shall become accustomed to me, and having no one else to talk to, she will gradually find herself chatting to me, as she did when first I knew her."

"Patty, you are a match-maker."

Now I am sure every body must see, after reading this letter, that the squire made his own bed, and so must lie on it. He would marry her, though she plainly showed she hated the idea of it. I did every thing I could to prevent it, and why she persisted in marrying him is one of those mysterious paradoxes that can never be explained. Did she secretly like him? or did she desire to be rich? or had her mother persuaded her? or her grandfather commanded her? I asked myself these questions a dozen times over, and could not answer them. Then I asked Robert, and he said at once:

"She is a woman, Patty, of all animals the most curiously fashioned and incomprehensibly organized."

"Now, Robert!"

Isn't it odd that men, even the best of men, such as Robert is, should have such odd notions of us women? And there is another weakness, too, which they possess in a frightful degree. They can not bear to think themselves in the wrong.

"Whipped! so she ought. Pet is a humbug, Patty. I believe she loves him; yet she has never called him Oliver once."

"No more she did, and we must not call her Pet any more. It is too familiar for the squire's lady."

"Fish! he will call you dear Patty. And quite right too. I agree with him. You are a dear Patty."

"Of course, Robert, that is very nice of you to say so."

"What are you crying about, Patty?"

"Oh, Robert, if she feels that he has made a mistake—that it can not be undone—that she loves somebody else!"

"Of all absurd little Patty. Lever knew you are the most preposterous. Pry your eyes, or I will have a divorce. I shall have the rheumatism for a week through merely sitting by such a damp creature. For your comfort, learn that the squire said to me: 'If he fancied he saw any thing matrimony was averse to in himself he would never have permitted an engagement to take place between them. But he could not help fancying he had the best chance of any man, and he did not see why he should lose it because she had some quite unaccustomed notion, very unlike your gushing Sarah Janes and impulsive Pattys.'"

"Robert, hold your tongue. I won't sit here and have my self abused. Go, go, go! You will—I remember to be kind and forbearing to me, for I expect to be utterly miserable."

III.

My goodness me! what a turn it gave me when I saw the clerk come over the bridge, and Robert waving his hat like mad, and I waved my handkerchief too, and Pet—I mean the squire's lady—looked out and saw me, and waved back. And upon my word there was the carriage with the impressive horses and the imperious servants covering them after putting their baby up at the Hall, and coming up to our door with the squire's and the squire's lady's compliments, and would I be so kind as to step up and dine?

Dine up and dine! I was all over a regard man, invented humanity. In fact, he did not seem to care in the least. The more they shouted, the more he seemed pleased. The more they bowed to shake hands and congratulate the more he obliged them.

And he made a speech, the first I suppose he ever had dared to utter, saying just what he did not intend to say.

"I thank you, my kind friends, for your warm welcome to my wife. I can only say that the more you know of her the more reason will you see for regarding me as a most fortunate man. I feel, my kind neighbors, and you, my tenants, will unite with me in making her so happy among us that she will regard this day as the brightest of her life."

"Now, Robert, if the squire had said that of me, what should I say?" "No, there is one brighter; the day on which I married you."

"And what has the day you married me got to do with the squire?"

"I have great misgivings. Why does she not call him Oliver?"

"He seems very contented. I never saw him look better, and he is on the broad grin all the time. I will tell you what I saw."

"What, Robert?"

"When he welcomed her home he gave her a kiss."

"No! before all the people! and what did she say?"

"She said, 'May the carriage go for Patty?'"

"Darling creature!"

So upon the whole my mind was a little more easy. Still she had rather a grave name, not with her, but she did not look unhappy, while the squire was positively radiant.

They entertained their return home by a series of entertainments. As I dressed to go to their first dinner-party I could not help thinking of those dull parties, in reference to all, that the squire gave when he was a bachelor. I wondered how it would be now, and if Pet would act the great lady, or the lady lady, or the sweet-tempered lady.

While I was thinking, if the imperious carriage with the imperious horses and servants did not drive up to our cottage door.

She looked so pretty when she came forward to greet us: not fine, or grand, or supercilious, but just the old affectionate Pet-sweet, and conscious that she was beautifully dressed, and looked well. As for the squire, he beamed with admiration. He could not take his eyes off her, and upon my word if she didn't seem to enjoy it.

And as I sat beyond him, she said, with a little sort of quick glance under her eyes, as I admired a new bracelet she had on:

"Yes, it is the prettiest I ever saw; Oliver gave it me."

And then she said another thing. She said to me: "I have no acquaintance, no ugly remains of teaching. I arrange my dress, I walk through my house, I give great orders, I send mamma all the notes the old thing gives me."

"Old thing!" I exclaimed, aghast.

"Yes, old thing; you are 'old thing' sometimes, and Robert. See, now, I will call him by that name. Old thing, I want you!" And the squire turned to her, delighted, bending down his stately back to listen to her little whisper, as pleased as if she had said "darling."

"Old thing, dear Robert!" said I, "did you ever see any thing so delightful, and did you ever enjoy yourself more? Was it not a merry dinner, and how we all chatted afterward! We will remember what I have endured in that great drawing-room, what a blessed change!"

We were all in the greatest state about Pet, and the dear sweet darling squire's lady she made. And our county people paid her the greatest compliments, and quite loved her. No party was thought any thing of unless our squire's lady was there. As for the poor, they adored her; as for the imperious servants, they obeyed her.

And did she at last love the dear good squire, who had so instantaneously discovered what a darling she was?

We could not tell. The "old thing" seemed necessary to happiness; but for one might judge by the many times she invoked him. Not as heretofore, in a sly, half-ashamed way, but openly, and rather ostentatiously.

"Where is my old thing?" she would say, imperiously. "I am here at a loss for what to do or say, and there is no old thing to tell me."

She had settled it between her and me, that when she required me for any particular purpose she was to place her pocket-handkerchief at her bedroom window: upon the seeing of which I was to hasten up to the great house.

I imagine the state of mind when one morning, on looking up at the great house, it appeared as if there was a white signal at the window.

"My goodness me, Robert, look there! They must have quarreled. Never, never more will I make another match. Oh, my dear Robert, leave me on with my shawl. Where is my bonnet? Do come with me; I shall cry my eyes out. Never, never will I attempt matrimony!"

Robert kindly consented to come with me: partly moved to do so, he said, lest I really should cry my eyes out, and then he knew would there be to do every thing for him? But I knew better. He was just as anxious as I was. So we hurried up. We took the liberty to knock at the front door bell, but ran in by the garden entrance.

There, in her boudoir, the prettiest and sweetest of all rooms, sat the squire and Pet on her sofa, her face buried in the cushions.

"Oh, my darling child!" I exclaimed, "let your poor Patty comfort you! Tell me, dear, what has he done? What has happened?"

"Oh, Patty, I am of all creatures everysomuch the most unhappy!"

"My darling, my dearest, sweetest darling, what can I do to relieve your misery?"

"That is what he said; but he goes all the same. Oh, Patty, a miserable man of a lawyer has sent for Oliver on county business, and he has gone away for two days. I could not bear myself, I am so much unhappy, so I sent for you. And oh! if there is an accident—if a horse runs the train—I shall die: I know I shall die. And I feel as if I hate Oliver's little child that is coming, because I am not to go with him, and I am afraid of the train too."

My goodness gracious me, Robert, am I standing on my head or my heels?

"Bodily, you are all right, Patty; mentally, you can hardly say. But, as all events, you are not so wholly distracted as to be any longer blind to Pet's love for her husband."

"Love," sighed Pet, "I know not what you call love. I love Oliver, my own Oliver, my own husband. I can not live two days without my old thing!"

And Pet and I cried and laughed together, and Robert and the squire looked wise, and going to join us both performances, when the door opened and in walked the squire. With a cry of delight Pet sprang up and flew to his arms, and then she said, in sounds that. But, however, it is not fair for me to tell. In fact, the sounds very distinctly proved that Pet had changed her mind in her ideas.

"Pet is a hypocrite," says Robert to me, as he tucked my arm under his, and we sped away home as quickly as we came. "She has loved him from the first."

"My dear Robert, our squire's lady—calling her names!"

"She is a hypocrite—you never gave me such a hug."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

NOTES AND QUERIES.

A CAREFUL HOUSEWIFE wishes to know what is the best way of procuring vinegar. We should think sending out for it.

Why celebrated their return home by a series of entertainments. As I dressed to go to their first dinner-party I could not help thinking of those dull parties, in reference to all, that the squire gave when he was a bachelor. I wondered how it would be now, and if Pet would act the great lady, or the lady lady, or the sweet-tempered lady.

While I was thinking, if the imperious carriage with the imperious horses and servants did not drive up to our cottage door.

EVERY MOLODY wants to know the derivation of the expression, "Let us have a stunner." We believe it was first employed by a young lady who was very much "struck" with a gentleman's appearance.

ROOT ODIUM is desirous of learning some means by which he can get rid of his unpleasant name. He should avoid dipping it into alcoholic liquors. If he tight hard, he might succeed in getting it changed to Root Beer, whichever may be most convenient.

YOUNG GENTLEMEN are hard to sing. Go and give a musical master gold, and he will give you notes in exchange.

Why is the letter "n" one of the chief causes of an appetite? Because it satisfy—Because without it meats would make you sick.

SEASONABLE STATEMENTS.

When people stick quarrelsome the performance may for convenience be described as a snow ball.

Although we are not fond of any signs of coming snow, we may, when we see a young gentleman putting on skates for the first time, exclaim, "Oh, my ice!"

Although there are no indications of an approaching thaw, we shall, when we see many people out in the sun, be sure of a break-up.

Though the most opposite of rain can be observed, we may, if we see four or five gentlemen turn into a tavern, look out for a fair drinking.

THE HAPPY FIGURAN.

"May we ne'er want a friend, a friend not to raise to give him?" Said Solomon once (and his proverbs are quite mine); "But I'll make you a bottle, dear friend, in a moment, But not while there's—hic—while there's any thing to do!"

KISSING CONSIDERED, BY JOHN BILLINGS.—"Man was made tew muss," so warbled Burns. "and woman was made tew muss," so warbled Billinger. One of these executants has his already immortalized, and the other I intend shall be as soon as the Legislater meets. I am not yet told how I shall bring the matter before that honorable body. I have got the idea how the immortal deed is to be spoken, and how the will arise if ever the law is passed. Then I'll give a few remarks upon kissing, upon kissing in the hump and kissing in the dessie, requires a extra extry education, and how to tell, by lite and skeer taste, and sum experience in testing. Kissing is one of those fu things that is better done than described; in fact, about the only way how describe it will in tew do it well. It is what I call a "natural awtomatic operation;" and judging from what we saw on human nature in this latitude, it will be a long time down in the Potomac, when he first discovered his wife. If Adam didn't kiss Eve as slick, as soon as the man I saw him tew her, and if Eve didn't relish it, it must hav bin bekaus it wasn will did. There is no more kissing in the world than there is fun from the rest or the fore ears, and that is, it don't exsize. Sum enjoy exhilaration, but few do it with the relish that the more undefined it was did (provided it didn't mix the mark) the more they seemed to hav beldish. The kissing is a good deal like eating; there is not much fun in a person in hungry) in standing by, and so it did bi smother follow, if it is did over so well. It is one of those fu things that if better done than described, and don't she enjoy disposition tew go out or fashion, and will keep sweet tew her husband. Sum men is like, if yu attend kissing in the hump, closely, yu will be led tew exclaim, "Fudge!" but that is our opin that it is as it is handy tew do it. Scksndly, that it is like Cooper's tea, it is more a man to meet coming him; and, thirdly, it is a frugal, highly concentrated, and reversed luxury.

Why has the noble animal that carries the Queen of Spain's children nothing "particular" to do with the subject?—Because it's her elephant (irrelevant).

Why is a summary of to-day's Times like a sweet thing in drinks?—Because it's the Daily Nectar.

INALIENABLE RIGHTS.—Every woman has a right to be of any age she pleases, for if she were to state her real age no one would believe her. Every one has a right to wear a mustache if he can. Every woman who makes puddings has a perfect right to put more plums and pudding than any other woman in the world. Every man has a perfect and undoubted right to think himself, by putting a few of the best hits aside. Every woman has a right to think her baby the prettiest baby in the world," and it would be the greatest folly to deny her this right, for she will believe so in spite of all. Every baby has a right to faint when she pleases, if her lover is by her side to catch her.

At the Lewisville skirmish the colonel of the Nineteenth Indiana, noticing some of the men ducking their heads as the shells fell about, rode along the line calling them to order. "Stand up your heads, and look like men." Immediately after, however, an 18-pounder shell burst within a few feet of the colonel, and he disappeared in all directions. Instinctively he jerked his head almost between his shoulders, while his horse squatted like a frog. "Boys," said he, as he raised up and reined in his steed, "I want you to look like horses."

A CHILDS BILL.—The following is a copy of a bill found among the effects of Wentworth Abbey (Earl Fitzwilliam).—November 1, 1805.—"Mr. J. Macquire, to J. Clark Dr.—To making a new head to a child, 6d.; ditto, and solidly repairing St. Joseph, 6d.; cleaning and ornamenting the Holy Ghost, 1s. 6d.; for replacing the Virgin's head and before, and making her a new child, 6s. 6d.; for putting a new nose to Moses, and making a new rod to his head, and giving a piece to his tail, 6s. 6d.; total, 12s. 6d. Received the amount."

A SEA OF TROUBLES.—The Papal see, just about this time.

TYRIAN PURPLE.

THE public have been familiarized of late years with the fact of the most fashionable and most beautiful colors of these modern times having been obtained from the waste products of coal tar, or alkalode to what are known as the aniline dyes, those deep and lovely blues, reds, purples, and violets, which are known as magenta, aniline, etc., dye in all kinds of fabrics become so attractive to the ladies. The history of the production of these vivid shades of color reminds us of how the most famed of all dye-stuffs was produced, namely, the Tyrian purple, which was so extensively used from the time of a shepherd inhabiting a sea-shell found on the shores of Tyre and the Mediterranean, the Murex trunculus, and others of the genus, in which there are altogether about sixty different varieties.

It is only none but the first among the people were allowed to wear purple, and it was not till a great increase of luxury had taken place that even the rich merchants were allowed to indulge in this symbol of wealth and taste. It is said that the art of making this purple, as practiced in Tyre and on the Mediterranean Sea, and others adjacent, with the imperiousness of one of the emperors, who would not allow it to be worn by a subject, holding it under high penalties for disobedience, to be the exclusive property of the throne alone to wear robes of the imperial color.

Other shells besides the one named were called into use in the extraction of purple and dyes of a similar color, as the Murex brandaris and the Buccinum, or trumpet fish, and on our own shores at a future time the whelk, in its many varieties, was employed by Mr. Edmund du Noncan who discovered the Purpura in great abundance on the coast of Provence. Mr. Cole also found out that the dog whelk yielded a fine dye, and Mr. Beaumont followed with experiments on the Buccinum, while a French naturalist, who was exploring the coasts of Spain, discovered that the dye could be extracted from the spawn emitted on the rocks by these shell-fish.

There is no authentic account of how the Tyrian purple was extracted, but the modus operandi, we infer, would be very simple: the requisite quantity of shells being gathered, they would be broken by force, so regulated, however, as not to injure the animal, and a certain little vein being opened, a few drops of the rich coloring fluid would be obtained; but the substance was so intense—for according to the Abbé Rayaul no color can be compared to it either in depth of tone or duration, of which latter assertion we have proof in the fact of the Greeks having found purple robes in the treasury of the king of Persia that were known to be two hundred years old, and yet were brilliant as ever—that a very little of this matter, which must, we think, have been largely diluted, went a long way in the process of dyeing. Another way was to draw the animal out of its shell, squeeze it gently to obtain the much-coveted liquor, and then allow it again to retire into its house, the animal being restored to a tank to feed and gather additional dye. This process was repeatedstill the animal became so weak and worthless that it was thrown to feed other fish. Smaller shells again were entirely crushed in a kind of mill, and the liquor drained off for use. The tint varied considerably it seems, according to the living and feeding-place of the animal, just as it is found in the present day that the color and flavor of all kinds of fish are dependent on the kind of water in which they live, and the quality of the food they can obtain. The largest and best fed Murices, of course, produced the finest dye.

A Bristol merchant of the name of Cole leaves us some crude information on the subject of this dye, dated so far back as 1684. This gentleman had heard through his correspondents of an ingenious Irishman who gained a great deal of money by marking fine linen with a beautiful purple color, the preparation of which was a secret only known to himself. Setting out in search of this native genius, Mr. Cole was not long in discovering that his fine coloring matter was obtained from a sea-shell. Briefly his directions, which apply to the whelk (Buccinum), are as follows: when the shell has been lightly broken, throw the slug, i.e., the inhabitant of the shell, into fresh water, where it will very speedily die. A white vein will then be seen lying transversely next to the head of the fish, and the matter from this vessel must be picked out with a camel hair pencil—it forms the dye. This is a suitable substance to write with on either calico or silk; the figures, in marking linen, will first, as Mr. Cole tells us, appear of a green, then of a yellow color, and then by successive changes will at last become purple. The mode of dyeing adopted by the Tyrians was to gather all the liquor into a bath, in which, for a longer or shorter period, always according to the intensity of color desired, they steeped the wool or other substance which was to be colored.

After the wool had been immersed for the requisite time in this preliminary bath, it was then thrown into a boiler filled with the liquor of another variety of shell-fish, and the stuffs that underwent this double process were very greatly esteemed and very costly, each pound weight of the colored wool being valued at not less than thirty pounds sterling! In fact, the genuine purple was even more valuable than gold itself. Immense quantities of the shell-fish were required, because each pound weight of stuff to be dyed required six pounds of the dye liquor, which must, of course, have been greatly diluted; but not even the well-known fecundity of shell-fish could stand such a constant drain as was needed for the dye-works; and of the quantities used we have evidence in the mounds that remain, so that it is no wonder that in time the art was abandoned or lost, rather because of a want of the raw material than from any tyrannical restriction in the manufacture. If we wanted to resume the making of this purple nowadays an eminent scientific man tells us that the best and cheapest way to manufacture it would be, not from these shell-fish, but from Peruvian guano. However, with the brilliant aniline dyes of the nineteenth century there is no need for us to reintroduce the Tyrian purple, even with the knowledge of the fact before us, that we could artificially cultivate the "buckies" in any required quantity, in the same way as we can multiply our supplies of oysters or pearl mussels

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH CABLE.

We give on this and the next page two illustrations—one representing the Great Eastern lying in the Medway, and receiving the Atlantic Telegraph Cable from one of the hulks employed to bring it from the manufacturers' yard at East Greenwich; the other showing the manner in which the cable is coiled and stowed away on board the Great Eastern. That mighty vessel, "hugest of all that swim the ocean deep," has undergone an internal transformation to fit her for her new duties as a cable-ship. The great object was to get as few coils of cable as possible—in fact, if possible, to have it all in one. Large, however, as the Great Eastern is, she could never hold the Atlantic Cable in one coil, for, apart from its weight, which is 5000 tons, its bulk in one mass would be gigantic—a coil 58 feet in diameter and nearly 60 feet high, enough to fill Astley's Theatre from the ground of the circus almost to the roof. It is dispelled, therefore, in three circular tanks—one aft, one amidships, and one forward. Each of these tanks is of solid wrought iron, watertight, built on what is called the 20-foot deck, and, with some minute differences, all are nearly alike in size—viz., 58 feet diameter and 20 feet high. The forward tank is from the shape of the ship, smaller in diameter than those amidships and aft, but the heights of all are alike. This tank is shown in the engraving on our next page, with the first portion of the cable. In order to sustain the enormous additional weight which will be placed on the decks when the whole of the cable is on board, the deck on which the tanks are erected is strengthened by a system of knees and deck-beams, while the lateral pressure of the cable against the sides of the tanks will be overcome by an arrangement of beams and supports, with the object of confining the dead weight of the cable to the centre of the ship, and overcoming all outward pressure.

The work of shipping the cable was begun on Thursday, the 19th ult., and will continue without intermission now until nearly the end of May, by which time it is hoped all will be coiled away snugly on board the great steamship. The total quantity of rope required to connect Valentia with Bull's Bay, Newfoundland, allowing for the "slack" which must run out to prevent too great a strain on the cable, is about 2200 nautical, or nearly 2700 statute miles. With this length a liberal margin is given of nearly 600 statute miles of rope for slack caused by currents, possible rough weather, and the avoidance of any thing like unusual strain on the cable in the deepest water. Over one part of the route the depth is as great as from 2500 to 2600 fathoms, or nearly three statute miles—a depth, however, which is only considered of importance in case of rough weather in paying out, the mere strength of the cable being sufficient to bear its own weight in eleven miles of still water. In this respect—as, indeed, in all others—the new cable has an enormous superiority over the old and ill-used rope which was first laid, and which, to the amazement of all those who knew its real condition, nevertheless remained in fair working order for a few days. In size, in strength, in better condition, better insulation, and better outer covering, the new rope is never less than three times as good as the old one, while in many cases, and these the most important, its superiority is four or five times greater. Though a much larger cable, its weight in water per mile is less than half that of its unfortunate predecessor, its breaking strain is 7½ tons against 3½ tons, the maximum strength of the old rope. The method of joining up the two-mile lengths in which it is constructed is also a great improvement upon the soldered joints in the wires of the first cable, while the standards for insulation and "conductivity" are as high as those devised for the Persian Gulf cable, and the tests are continuous in every portion of the manufacture.

ARCANA WATCH.

An Elegant Novelty in Watches.

The cases of this watch are an entirely new invention, composed of a beautiful white metal, which, when polished and plated, producing an exact imitation of 18-carat gold. Each case is stamped with the name of the watch. They are as beautiful and durable as solid gold, and are offered at one-tenth the price. The case is handsomely engraved, with panel and shield for name, with patent pushpin, and encased in the exact style of the celebrated Gold Hunting Levers, and are really handsome and desirable, and at once attract the admiration of gold as it fades. The movement is manufactured by the well-known St. James' Watch Company of Europe, and are superior finished, having engraved pallets, finely carved bridges, adjusting regulator, patent hair balance, the improved lever jewelel action, with line dial, and skeleton hands, and is warranted a good timekeeper. These watches are of three different sizes, the smallest being for ladies, and are all hunting cases. A case of six of these watches sent, express for $15.5. A single one sent in an elegant morocco case for $2 50. Liberal terms and rates for agents. We are the sole agents for the watch in the United States, and none are genuine without the name of the watch.

Important to Subscribers.

Subscribers to the MAGAZINE and WEEKLY will find upon the wrapper of each Number a Statement of the Precise Time to which the Subscription is Paid. Please examine the Number with which the Subscription EXPIRES, as given on our books. Every Subscriber may thus ascertain whether he has received the proper credit for remittances, and also when to renew his Subscription. In renewing Subscriptions, Subscribers are particularly requested to advise the TIME with which the New Subscription should commence; they will thus prevent mistakes, duplicates, or missing Numbers. It is desirable that a Renewal should be received a few weeks before the Subscription expires, to prevent interruption, in order that our books may be kept properly adjusted. Back Numbers will be supplied to supply the errors which unavoy both Publishers and Subscribers.

OFFICERS.

Hon. DANIEL S. DICKINSON, President; WILLIAM T. PIERPO, Vice-President; ROBERT RAMSEY, Secretary; T. J. HUNTER, Mining Superintendent, Titusville, Pa.; ATLANTIC BANK, 140 Broadway, N. Y., Treasury.

NEW YORK AND LIVERPOOL PETROLEUM COMPANY'S REFINERY, TITUSVILLE, PENNSYLVANIA.

This thoroughly well-equipped and complete Petroleum Refinery is in the centre of the borough of Titusville, immediately adjoining the tornlines, and fronting the depôt, of the Oil Creek Railroad, now known as the New York and Liverpool Refinery, formerly the Mowbray Refinery. This estate consists of about five and a half acres of land—all good oil territory—and twenty-eight buildings. It includes a dwelling-house, with twenty-four rooms, parlors, barn, ice-house, stabling, &c.; an efficient and valuable water-power equal to eighteen horse-power, which saves the whole expense of a steam engine for running the works of the refinery, and which may be easily used for drilling wells any where on the estate; operating rooms, tanks, stills, pipes, and other utensils, fixtures, &c., necessary to constitute a full suit of first-class, effective, and money-saving, safe, and economical refining works; a coopering and barrel-making establishment, machine-shop, blacksmith's shop, &c., &c. These works are competent to turn out two hundred barrels a week of refined oil. The works have been run for four years without accident, and their product has already an established reputation in the oil market. Reliable estimates show that at 165 barrels of refined oil a week, the net profit of running the works would be over $400 a week. Upon the land attached to this estate there is abundant space for sinking twenty-five wells, which, by shafting from the water-power, can be done with a saving of the heaviest items of the whole, viz., steam engines, fuel, and engineer's wages. Pipe for one well has in fact already been driven down 60 feet; the derrick, shafting, &c., are all ready, and the work is to be prosecuted at once.

The Wells of this Company are now producing Oil.

Payment for stock may be made in drafts, registered note, or government bonds and securities, which bonds and securities will be taken at their market value. Remittances may be addressed to the Company, P. O. Box 5368, New York City, or to "Atlantic Bank, Treasury of the New York and Liverpool Petroleum Company, 140 Broadway, New York City." Prospectus sent to any address on application, containing a full and clear account of the operations of this

Most Successful Petroleum Company.

Certificates.

I have thoroughly tested the new "National Revolver," and find it an effective weapon, of quick fire and convenient size. At fifty yards, I think I could with this Pistol kill every shot. I take pleasure in recommending it as a weapon in every way desirable. In company with Capt. Reed, Provost-Marshall, and other officers, I fired this pistol a large number of times, and not one cartridge failed to explode. (Signed) JOHN CHTON,
Chief of Police, Cairo, Ill.

We have one of the "National Revolvers" now in use, and pronounce it one of the most perfect things of the kind we ever saw. It is simple in construction, substantial, sure fire, and shoots with the force and accuracy of a rifle. Any one in want of a good and reliable weapon can not do better than procure a "National Revolver."

(Signed) J. S. VINT,
Editor and Proprietor "New Era."

We, the undersigned, having used and thoroughly tested the National Revolvers, have no hesitancy in saying that, for accuracy, force, and compactness, we think they are superior to any other Revolver yet produced.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

1865.

Behold her now, with restless, flashing eyes,
Crouching, a thing forlorn, beside the way!
Behold her ruined altars heaped to-day
With ashes of her costly sacrifice!

How changed the once proud State that led the strife,
And flung the war-cry first throughout the land!
See helpless now the parricidal hand
Which aimed the first blow at the nation's life!

The grass is growing in the city's street,
Where stand the shattered spires, the broken walls;
And through the solemn mourning silence falls
The sentry's footstep as he treads his beat.

Behold once more the old flag proudly wave
Above the ruined fortress by the sea!
No longer shall that glorious banner be
The ensign of a land where dwells the slave.

Hark! on the air what swelling anthems rise—
A ransomed people, by the sword set free,
Are chanting now a song of liberty!
Hear how their voices echo to the skies!

O righteous retribution, great and just!
Behold the palm-tree fallen to the earth,
Where Freedom, rising from a second birth,
No more shall trail her garments in the dust!

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MARCH 18, 1865.

THE INAUGURAL ADDRESS.

THE inaugural address of the President is characteristically simple and solemn. He neither speculates, nor prophesies, nor sentimentalizes. Four years have revealed to every mind the ghastly truth that the Government of the United States is struggling in a death-grapple with slavery; and as a new epoch of the Government opens in civil war, its Chief Magistrate states the truth of the contest, and invokes God's blessing upon the effort of the country to finish its work in triumph. With a grave, grand and quaint vigor, unprecedented in modern politics, the President says: "Fondly do we hope, fervently do we pray, that this mighty scourge of war may soon pass away. Yet, if God wills that it continue until all the wealth piled by the bondman's two hundred and fifty years of unrequited toil shall be sunk, and until every drop of blood drawn with the lash shall be paid with another drawn with the sword, as was said three thousand years ago, so still it must be said: 'The judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether.'"

We are especially glad that the inaugural does not, as the New York Tribune wishes it did, "appeal to the rebels for a cessation of hostilities as plead ugly as its prototype [the first inaugural] urges forbearance from beginning them." Such a tone would have been neither politic nor humane. When the President speaks of "the progress of our arms upon which all else chiefly depends," every man is reminded of the peculiar history of the last year, and of the terms which have been constantly repeated, and which are perfectly well known to the rebels and to the world. Those terms are unconditional submission to the laws of the United States.

We are equally glad that the President indulges in no observations upon Mexico, England, France, and things in general. He was taking the oath to continue the work in which his conduct has so satisfied the country that he is continued in his office by general assent. With a fine sense of propriety he says, in the gravest of most impressive way, that he accepts the trust and prays for strength to do his duty. And all true American hearts say, Amen!

THE PERILS OF THE RAIL.

THERE have been more than fifty serious railway accidents in the country since the year opened. In the last week of February there were ten, and since the first of January more than sixty people have been killed, and more than five hundred wounded. The Ohio Senate has appointed a Committee to report upon some plan by which human life can be better protected upon railroads. Scarcely a day passes that some disaster is not recorded, and if the people of the country, their Legislatures, do not help themselves they are likely to go unaided.

That Government should not meddle with private affairs is very true. But wholesale slaughter upon railroads which derive all their privileges from the people is not a private affair. There is a contract between the companies and the people. Personal safety is one of the inevitable although unexpressed conditions of the contract. If it is broken by the privileged party, the party that grants the privilege may properly take the steps necessary to secure the fulfilment of the conditions. Legislative control of a railroad company may be undesirable, but universal accident and slaughter upon railroads are much less desirable; and whenever a company established for the public convenience becomes a public danger, the public will very properly insist upon taking care of itself, by imposing new conditions upon the company.

So unfortunate a season for railroad travel was never known in this country. The reasons are many. All the roads are well worn. The price of iron has been so high that, at a time when the roads were most worked, repairs have been delayed. The long-continued frosts have weakened the rails and the iron-work of the locomotives. The throng of passengers and the press of freight have been unprecedented, and the Government has constantly wanted locomotives and engineers. Consequently, as we have pointed in every direction; locomotives have been disabled; trains have been whirled from the track; the cars have been crowded and uncomfortable; time-tables have been utterly useless; connections have been seldom made, and trains have been quite generally delayed.

If any man thinks that the Legislature has no right to meddle with private affairs we should like to seat him in a car from New York to New Haven, and when the train is thundering along at thirty miles an hour, jerking and jumping from the track and every passenger waiting for the crash, ask his opinion of the right of any company to play with human life as it is played with upon that road. Or if he is confident that every company should be left to mind its own affairs, we should like to stand him up in a car upon the New York Central from Albany to Utica, with no chance of a seat, and, reminding him that there was no question of helping himself by the competition of another road, ask him whether he paid his fare for the privilege of discomfort, and whether the charter was granted for the public accommodation or not.

Of course the companies are not responsible for not overcoming the elements; but they are responsible for not accommodating their business to circumstances. For instance, a traveler lately left Albany for the West upon the Central Road. The train was made up, and there were twelve cars. It was crowded, and in every car some passengers were standing all the way. The weather was cold, and when the traveler who sat near the stove asked that it might be tended the fires to put in some dry wood he replied, good-humoredly: "Dried wood! Golly, there are twenty-four stoves in the train and only two on 'em has any fire, and yourn's one. Ef yer wait for dry wood you'll freeze pretty sudden. This wood was all cut down this mornin'." From eight o'clock in the morning until ten at night there was no stoppage for eating. The train was laboring along behind time; and whether, as the critic said, the whole system of the road was interested in coal, and so had had the locomotives changed from wood-burners to coal-burners; or whether the company's parsimony had compelled the Company to use green wood to make steam, the result was the same, the most baffling and disastrous delay.

"I advise every body to keep cool and take it philosophical," said a traveler, who was calmly smoking a cigar, at ten o'clock in the evening.

"I have been cool and philosophical," said the traveler, and I hain't made but two connections in all that time. Might as well be cool about it. Here's this Central Road. Out of sixty locomotives, twenty of 'em are broke. Two smashed up this morning at Utiky. Better take it philosophical." All this time no water was to be found for the boilers. Every one of these inconveniences could have been easily remedied by an efficient superintendence; and if the increased weight of the trains or diminished power of the locomotives prevented making time the time could be altered.

It was agreeable for the travelers in that train to reflect that the Company, which was responsible for all this discomfort, was at that very moment beseeching the Legislature for additional privileges. But if the Central Road treats its passengers like dogs, even with the high charge them two cents a mile, it will treat them like pigs when it can charge them three. There is a profound public sentiment back of the increased grant. But it is undoubtedly true that if the Company had been careful to be courteous and considerate, and had, by very obvious and simple means, secured the public against most of the ill-feeling of the public, the new grant would have been regarded very differently.

It remains to be seen whether any fresh securities of greater public safety and comfort are to be made the conditions of the new privileges of this dangerous corporation.

THE OLD SOPHISTRY.

THE London Times, in politely saying to its late pets the rebels, "emancipation will not save you," adds that such an act upon the part of "the confederate" would merely make it absolutely clear that "the federals were fighting, not for the freedom of the negro or the soil, but for imperial dominion, and nothing else."

When the Scottish Absentee was defeated at Culloden, when SHITH O'BRIEN was seized in Ireland and transported, when the Sepoys were blown from cannon in India, what was the British Government doing? Was it fighting for imperial dominion and nothing else, or was it fighting to maintain the authority of the Government? Is not every sovereign power fighting for imperial dominion when it refuses to yield to rebellion upon its own domain? And has the Government of the United States less rightful sovereign authority over the United States than England has over Scotland, Ireland, or India?

It is necessary constantly to expose this absurdity, because incessant repetition at last works conviction.

Or is it pretended that this Government is debarred from maintaining its sovereignty by force because it exists by the consent of the governed? Does the Times or any Englishman gravely assert that therefore any citizen may refuse to pay his tax, or to resist a law which he does not like? If he does, he should mend his knowledge by a little study.

When the Parliament took arms against CHARLES FIRST, that was the justification. That he had violated the Constitution of England. What was that Constitution? It was a theory, a system of laws and precedents. The theory was that the Government should consist of King, Lords, and Commons. Each part had its privilege. The King asserted a privilege which the Lords and Commons denied it. The most vehement Parliamentary historians agree that the limits of the prerogative had never been exactly defined. Why, then, had not the King a right to determine the limits as well as the Parliament? Because, rightfully answered Parliament, that would put the liberties of every Englishman at his mercy. The King must do nothing against the law, and the law is made by the representatives of the people. The law, therefore, expresses the will or consent of the people. Does the Times deny that the Government of England exists by the practical consent of England? What else did Lord BROUGHAM mean when he said in Blairgowrie, two years ago, that the British Government would remain neutral in the American war, because undoubtedly the majority of Englishmen sympathized with the American Government? What is the danger that threatens England today? That the power of the people will be disregarded; in which case, the London Times would be terribly taught what is the source of government.

"Yes," says the Times, "but the English never admitted the right of revolution." But whether they have or not, they have practiced it. What is the foundation of the present system in England but "the glorious revolution" of 1688 which drove JAMES SECOND from the throne? What was its justification? The wrongs of the people, which, in reality, the present or prospective legal redress. What was the justification of the American revolution of 1776? That the people of the Colonies, which had no present or prospective legal redress. That is the only right of revolution ever asserted in America, and that came in direct descent from England.

But the right of revolution can neither be pleaded for the rebels, nor do they plead it for themselves. It is the right of secession by which they justify their rebellion. Not only had they no unredressed wrongs to declare, but JEFFERSON DAVIS, last December, confessed that the rebellion was a mistake, although he did not refuse to yield to the secession of his State. The American people have no more asserted the right of any State or section to secede from their government at pleasure than the English have asserted it; and any ceaseless insurrection in Kent or Yorkshire could as properly plead the revolution of '88 as a justification as the rebellion in the South can plead the principles of '76.

There is many a man who is perplexed by such sophistry as this of the Times and of Lord RUSSELL'S dogma, that "the North is fighting for empire and the South for independence." But a little reflection will show him the fallacy.

MR. POWELL'S PICTURE.

THE Senate of the United States has appropriated twenty-five thousand dollars for the purchase of a picture, by Mr. W. H. POWELL, to be placed in the Capitol at Washington. Senator SUMNER in vain endeavored to provide that no contract should be made until competition had been invited among the painters of the country. The resolution was pressed to a vote, and carried by twenty-three yeas against seventeen nays.

Against this action of the Senate we enter a protest. Mr. POWELL is doubtless a deserving gentleman. We certainly know nothing to the contrary. But he does not rank among the two most eminent painters in the country; while the sum appropriated is, we believe, the largest ever paid by Congress for a picture. Mr. POWELL'S picture of DE SOTO discovering the Mississippi hangs in the rotunda of the Capitol at Washington, and it is, in no sense, a work of the highest excellence. But the question involved is not personal. Our objection to the proceeding would be the same whoever had been named by the President.

We know nothing of the methods which have been employed to secure this preference of Mr. POWELL; but we do know something of the manner in which such a result is usually achieved. It is what is commonly called lobbying. It has little reference to the capacity of the artist or to the value of the work. The interest of some Senator or Senators is enlisted by personal appeals—not pecuniary, but personal. The pressure of private recommendations is brought to bear—recommendations well merited doubtless as to the worth of the individual, but not valuable as to the ability of the artist—until finally the matter becomes a point of pride, and the project is consummated. The consequences of such a method may be contemplated in the Capitol. They are both ludicrous and humiliating.

Finally the proper course is an open competition. There is not a painter in the country who would not gladly compete for such a work and such a price, and the collection of cartoons which would thus be produced would be both valuable and interesting, while many of those which were unsuccessful would be privately commissioned. This course would enhance the dignity of American art and the popular interest in it; and however opinions might differ as to the propriety of the final decision of the Congressional Committee, there would be no question that all possible means had been taken to reach a fair verdict. This can never be the case so long as the present method is pursued. It is seldom known that a picture is to be ordered until the preparations are completed to secure the success of a certain individual. The inevitable result is dissatisfaction and suspicion, by which the artist himself does not fail to suffer.

The Capitol of the United States is in many respects a noble building; and Mr. POWELL is, we have no doubt whatever, a very worthy gentleman. If there is any good reason why the present arrangement should make him a favored one, we do not complain. But why should the Senate employ a worthy gentleman at a high price to deface the Capitol?

MR. GILMER'S LETTER.

AMONG the reluctant rebels was Mr. GILMER, of North Carolina. He was formerly conspicuous in Congress, and so moderate "a Southerner" that his name was mentioned among those of his section who might be properly invited to a place in Mr. LINCOLN'S cabinet four years ago. Mr. GILMER is a large slaveholder, and has been a quiet and conservative member of the rebel Congress at Richmond.

After the failure of the late peace negotiations Mr. GILMER introduced some resolutions into the rebel House which, if disease had not deranged his mind, are intelligible only as a cunning satire upon the absurdity of the claims of the rebellion. They are in the form of a supplement to the resolutions which declare that the rebels will prosecute the war until they have gained their independence, and resolve that, whereas the Confederate States of America, the Confederate States would consent to—" what does the reader suppose? They would consent, resolves the sly Mr. GILMER, to that there be a separation between the United States and the Confederate States of America, each perfectly free and independent of each other."

That is the first thing they would "consent to." They would further consent that there should be a "Diet," to which each might send its own delegates and in such manner as it chose. In the Diet there should be but two votes, one by the Northern, the other by the Southern delegates, and its acts should be binding upon neither party until ratified by both. Finally, the rebels would consent to allow Kentucky and Missouri to decide, by a vote of the people resident in those States at the beginning of the war, whether they would go with the North or the South.

This is grim jesting. It is not difficult to imagine Mr. GILMER, after hearing Mr. LINCOLN'S speech, which declared the last hope of the rebellion to be the help of the slaves, rising and suggesting that the Confederate army think, whereas the "Confederate States" took up arms to secure their independence, and whereas, after a war of four years, they are now manifestly overcome by the superior power of the Government, and whereas they can not secure their independence by arms, therefore the same "Confederate States," as a compromise and final adjustment of the quarrel, will "consent to" the recognition of their independence by the United States Government!

THE SOUTHERN PEOPLE UNDECEIVED.

WITH what the rebel leaders wonder that the people around them no longer trust them? The Southern people are rapidly discovering that they have been fooled by men whose aim was their own aggrandizement, not the welfare of the whole. These men cry frantically to their followers to stand fast. But why should they? Don't despond, says General LEE. But why should they not? Have the results of the war or its conduct been such as to teach them confidence?

The Richmond Examiner despairingly exclaims: "If Richmond be held but another six months the fate of the Confederacy will have been favorably decided."

This was on the 27th of February, 1865; but in February, 1861, just four years before, JEFFERSON DAVIS said in Stevenson, Alabama: "Your border States will gladly come into the Southern Confederacy within sixty days." And we will be your only friends. England will recognize us, and a glorious future is before us. The grass will grow in the Northern cities where the pavements have been worn by the trend of commerce. We will carry war where it is easy to advance, where food for the sword and torch await the armies in the densely populated cities."

Do the rebel chiefs suppose that the men to whom they appeal have no sense and no memory? At the opening of the war JEFFERSON DAVIS told them it would be a holiday task to establish "the Southern Confederacy." Then JEFFERSON DAVIS quakes in Richmond, and his confederates implore the people whom he deceived four years ago to cling to Richmond and all will be well. It is too late. The Southern people have seen the terrible hand fall upon the wall. They know that the leaders who dragged them into rebellion for their own selfish ends now entreat them to remain that the leaders may escape their just doom. No wonder that LEE's army comes into our lines by companies. No wonder that half the rebel army has deserted.

BLOWING HOT AND COLD.

NOTHING can show more vividly the hopeless dismay and confusion of mind of the rebel whippers-in, than the two extracts that follow, both from the same journal, the Richmond Examiner.

On the 22d of February it said: "The fall of Richmond in itself, apart from the moral opinion involved in the fact that it has been the great objective point of a four years' war, and also the fact that it is the principal workshop of the Confederate armies, would not involve the failure of our cause."

On the 27th of February, five days afterward, the same journal issues a wild cry against the evacuation of the city. It sneers at DAVIS and BENJAMIN for hinting that its loss would not be fatal. "It has become the symbol of the Confederacy. Its loss would be material ruin to the cause, and in a moral point of view absolutely destructive, crushing the heart and extinguishing the last hope of the country.....Let us think of establishing a Confederacy and of securing its recognition among nations would be gone for ever."

SOCIAL HEROISM.

Ash Wednesday.

DEAR MR. EDITOR,—The Fast season has begun in good earnest, and it hastens to inform you of a new and heroic development of patriotism. The frightful cost of all material for fine dresses has filled many ladies of the highest ability with a spirit of noble renunciation. There is nothing they will not gladly sacrifice, and they are therefore firmly resolved to dispense with dress altogether. I know that you will permit me to call the heroic movement already advancing. It began at the top of the dress, and the most unflinching of the fair patriots have already reached a point in the sacrifice far below the neck. The delightful emulation continues, so that by the opening of the next season we may confidently expect to see perfect heroism.

Of course as dress disappears a refined and delicate substitute is provided. The neck, for instance, is draped in the most exquisite enamel; the arms are protected by the rosiest rouge, and lest the exposure of the eyelows and eyelids should be injurious to health, they are clothed in the richest henna. This simple costume is surely enough for those who are ready for the last sacrifice. What sublime scenes! What unspeakable renunciation! The farther it goes the more indescribable it is. I will tell you what you would come and see for yourself. We never think of not going to parties now when there is so much to be seen; and what do we not owe to fellow-feeling surrender every night? Whenever old pig to whom I was dilating with enthusiasm upon the subject, replied, "Yes, I have seen a great many time. but this goes beyond the entirely new view of woman." Of course it does. Is it not clear that every one who is capable of talking put in the above conversation is capable of any thing?

I know that you are interested in every thing which shows devotion to the country, and although you were a little skeptical about the Women's League to make cotton cards and spinning-wheels, you thought there was some evasion about it. I am sure you will hear with astonishment and gratitude of this truly brave economy which conceals nothing. All for our country or dress well lost, is the inspiring rallying cry of the lovely patriots.

Good-by. I will be off to dress for the ball, which the ladies used to do before these patriotic days. Yet Dress is just the difference between us now. And how much more noble they save themselves! But all virtue has its compensation. Remember I have told you nothing but the naked truth, and have barely time to subscribe myself,

Yours in breathless expectation,
THOMAS FELT.

COLONEL COLYER.

EVERY honest man will be glad of the appointment by the Governor of Colonel VINCENT COLYER as Superintendent of the New York Soldiers' Depôt. Colonel COLYER has devoted himself unreservedly from the beginning of the rebellion to the truest service of the country, and his earnestness, efficiency, fidelity, and profound conviction of the justice of the war have made him one of the best friends of the soldiers. We congratulate all of them who fall into his hands. He shall will be fortunate if every appointment made by Governor FENTON is as wise as that of Colonel COLYER.

LITERARY.

THE new edition of THACKERAY's works to be issued by the HARPERS, of which "Vanity Fair" in three volumes, is now ready, is one of the most beautiful series of volumes ever printed. The text, the paper, and the binding, will delight all collectors of exquisite books, while the elegant and permanent form thus given to the works of one of the great masters of English literature will satisfy his sincerest lovers. A new and happy device in the "getting up" of this edition of "Vanity Fair" is the facsimile of the water-color sketches by the author, and the portrait which adorns it is engraved from LAWRENCE's drawing, which reproduces that characteristic look of the head which all the friends of THACKERAY will instantly recall. The illustrations are from the originals made by the author, and the edition is prepared with a faithful care which will give it precedence over all others.

DR. DRAPER's "History of the Intellectual Development of Europe," one of the most remarkable works of the day, has been republished in London, and Italian and Dutch translations are in preparation. The last number of the Westminster Review, in the course of an article upon it, speaks of the work of this accomplished American scholar as "one of the not least remarkable achievements in the progress of philosophy that has been made in the English tongue. It is a noble and even magnificent attempt to frame an induction from all the records of the progress of European society, of North African history, and thereupon to establish certain general principles of social and political development.....It has been elaborated with a degree of care, assiduity, and attention to orderly arrangement, combined with a power of clear and very eloquent diction, which give it an independent interest of the highest character to any mind not familiar with the subject which the author has chosen for it presents. All the latest researches in history, all the most recent discoveries in the realms of science, mechanical, physical, and human, and language, every minutiæ particular that can explain or illustrate the general progress of all the European nations, each the most recent and the most accurately and copiously detailed in their several relations, have been carefully collected into an array of representation as can render a book not only such as we ought to read, but also such as we like to read. The style with the most elaborate philosophical subtleties, such as the theology of Buddhism, the psychology of Plato, and the necromancy of Egypt, with a facility and clearness that fit the subject which much facilitates for the reader the process of assimilation. Again, there are passages such as those describing the social condition of Indian intellect, the corruption and immorality of the late days of the Roman empire, the progress of the Saracens compared with the Christian discoveries of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, where DR. DRAPER soars to a height of eloquence and composition which may by no means impairing the cogency of, a strictly philosophic treatise."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE SITUATION.

THE military record of the past week furnishes but a single item, a picket-skirmish on Saturday, the 11th, at General Early's army and the capture of its commander, giving no promise at the moment of Confederation. This information comes to us from General GRANT. It is based upon the statements of deserters, the authority of the reports, coming as they did from various parts of the country's lines, is sufficiently large to warrant what is believed then to be true.

In Georgia and in Tennessee we have no precise information, but there is good reason to believe that he has effected a junction with SHERMAN, and that the rebel forces under Regard and Wilmington, taking Florence and securing its railroad communications, will be compelled to evacuate Danville, the scheme would have been bolder than practicable, and the rebel forces, under the most prompt pressure against the line from Richmond westward, with a powerful reserve force of deserters, would be unlikely to rest, the necessity of SHERMAN's moving on Danville may be a strategic necessity, but we do not think it may be clear that the road through Lynchburg, traversing the southern State of Virginia, is the only route by which the enemy than the road through Danville traversing one half that distance. The railroad from Lynchburg to Danville in South Carolina is either already destroyed by Sherman's army or will be destroyed by it before it. If any also to be remembered that Lynchburg, once in our possession, is a formidable position against Confederate attack; but also it should be borne in mind that GRANT's extensive line of defense from Richmond to Petersburg.

Our lines are now complete to HATCHER's Run, to which place General MEADE extended his left. The enemy have been under the impression that GRANT was massing his forces for a new attempt to turn the Confederate right. Our army in Virginia is being strongly reinforced by the constant arrival of fresh troops from the field. The three hundred thousand men then soon to be added to our forces will enable General GRANT to act with a force to compete with great vigor. This, by-the-way, is the expectation of large numbers of persons in Confederate Congress proposes to raise. The House has passed another bill calling for those between the ages of seventeen and the Senate, in the fact that it does not guarantee freedom to rebel slaves. The passage of the bill, however, gives to General Lee's recommendation, it is likely to prove rather a source of relief to the Confederate army. The policy of a war to prosecute slavery is suicidal. The opposition to the bill, be overcome by the necessity to employ every available armed force to keep the negroes under control during the absence of the white population. If the bill should be been perfected, they will take the first opportunity which offers to turn their arms against their masters, whose army of them have indeed, but whom they would easily smother for their deliverance within their power. At the same time the State of Virginia, through her Legislature, has authorized the Confederate President to call upon her for her quota of her soldiers.

THE PRESIDENT'S INAUGURATION.

The great political event of the week was the President's re-inauguration on the 4th. The ceremony was very interesting and impressive. The following was the Inaugural Address delivered by the President:

"FELLOW-COUNTRYMEN.—At this second appearing to take the oath of the Presidential office there is less occasion for an extended address than there was at the first. Then, a statement, somewhat in detail, of a course to be pursued seemed fitting and proper. Now, at the expiration of four years, during which public declarations have been constantly called forth on every point and phase of the great contest which still absorbs the attention and engrosses the energies of the nation, little that is new could be presented. The progress of our arms, upon which all else chiefly depends, is as well known to the public as to myself, and it is, I trust, reasonably satisfactory and encouraging to all. With high hope for the future, no prediction in regard to it is ventured.

"On the occasion corresponding to this four years ago, all thoughts were anxiously directed to an impending civil war. All dreaded it—all sought to avert it. While the inaugural address was being delivered from this place, devoted altogether to saving the Union without warblood-curdling fact, an insurgent army was organized with the object of breaking up the Union by war. While the latter was avowedly for the purpose of preserving the integrity of the whole Union, the former aimed to destroy it without war—seeking to dissolve the Union, and divide effects, by negotiation. Both parties deprecated war; but one of them would make war rather than let the nation survive; and the other would accept war rather than let it perish. And the war came.

"One-eighth of the whole population were colored slaves, not distributed generally over the Union, but localized in the southern part of it. These slaves constituted a peculiar and powerful interest. All knew that this interest was somehow the cause of the war. To strengthen, perpetuate, and extend this interest was the object for which the insurgents would rend the Union, even by war; while the Government claimed no right to do more than to restrict the territorial enlargement of it. Neither party expected for the war the magnitude or the duration which it has already attained. Neither anticipated that the cause of the conflict might cease with, or even before, the conflict itself should cease. Each looked for an easier triumph, and a result less fundamental and astounding. Both read the same Bible, and pray to the same God, and each invokes His aid against the other. It may seem strange that any men should dare to ask a just God's assistance in wringing their bread from the sweat of other men's faces; but let us judge not, that we be not judged. The prayers of both could not be answered—that of neither has been answered fully. The Almighty has His own purposes. "Woe unto the world because of offenses! for it must needs be that offenses come; but woe to that man by whom the offense cometh." If we shall suppose that American slavery is one of those offenses which, in the providence of God, must needs come, but which, having continued through His appointed time, He now wills to remove, and that He gives to both North and South this terrible war, as the woe due to those by whom the offense came, shall we discern therein any departure from those divine attributes which the believers in a living God always ascribe to Him? Fondly do we hope—fervently do we pray—that this mighty scourge of war may speedily pass away. Yet, if God wills that it continue until all the wealth piled by the bondman's two hundred and fifty years of unrequited toil shall be sunk, and until every drop of blood drawn with the lash shall be paid by another drawn with the sword, as was said three thousand years ago, so still it must be said, "The judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether."

"With malice toward none; with charity for all; with firmness in the right, as God gives us to see the right, let us strive on to finish the work we are in; to bind up the nation's wounds; to care for him who shall have borne the battle, and for his widow, and his orphan—to do all which may achieve and cherish a just and a lasting peace among ourselves, and with all nations."

THE END OF THE THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS.

The closing days of the thirty-eighth Congress were hurried through without much ceremony. We give the result of the last days in our usual chronicle.

March 1:

In the Senate, a bill was passed giving the Lieutenant-General's rank and staff the pay of a Brigadier-General. The $600,000,000 Loan bill passed without amendment. The Indian Appropriation bill was passed. So the bill to establish the office of Naval Judge Advocate.

In the House, the Conference Tariff bill and the Legislative Appropriation bill were passed.

March 2:

In the Senate, the Tax bill was perfected and adopted.

In the House, the Congressional Standing Committees were established. 1. Committee on Appropriations. 2. Committee on Ways and Means. 3. Committee on Pacific Railroad. HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A COMPANION.—A parrot was lately advertised, and offered pointing it: personal beauties, its other accomplishments were thus described: "Will talk anything. Is a perfectly good trumpet; no bad language; well worth the attention of a family circle that may want company." We do not remember to have met with any human advertisement more fully gifted, and would recommend any elderly bachelor, in making his election, to ponder maturely upon the merits of the young ladies who may tempt him from celibacy and the above state of the poll.

THE THREE WISHES.

THE eastern origin of this tale seems evident; had it been originally composed in a northern land, it is probable that the king would have been represented as dethroned by means of bribes obtained from his own treasury.

There was once a wise emperor who made a law, that to every stranger who came to his court a fried fish should be served. The servants were directed to take notice, if, when the stranger had eaten the fish to the bone on one side, he turned it over and began on the other side. If he did, he was to be immediately seized, and on the third day thereafter he was to be put to death. But, by a great stretch of imperial clemency, the culprit was permitted to utter one wish each day, which the emperor pledged himself to grant, provided it was not to spare his life. Many had already perished in consequence of this edict, when, one day, a count and his young son presented themselves at court. The fish was served as usual, and when the count had removed all the fish from one side, he turned it over, and was about to commence on the other, when he was suddenly seized and thrown into prison, and was told of his approaching doom. Sorrow-stricken, the count's young son besought the emperor to allow him to die in the room of his father; a favor which the monarch was pleased to accord him. The count was accordingly released from prison, and his son was thrown into his cell in his stead. As soon as this had been done, the young man said to his jailers: "You know I have the right to make three demands before I die; go and tell the emperor to send me his daughter, and a priest to marry us." This first demand was not much to the emperor's taste, nevertheless he felt bound to keep his word, and he therefore complied with the request, to which the princess had no kind of objection. This occurred in the times when kings kept their treasures in a cave, or in a tower set apart for the purpose, like the Emperor of Morocco in these days; and on the second day of his imprisonment the young man demanded the king's treasures. If his first demand was a gold one, the second was not less so; still, an emperor's word is sacred, and having made the promise, he was forced to keep it; and the treasures of gold and silver and jewels were placed at the prisoner's disposal. On getting possession of them, he distributed them profusely among the courtiers, and soon he had made a host of friends by his liberality.

The emperor began now to feel exceedingly uncomfortable. Unable to sleep, he rose early on the third morning and went, with fear in his heart, to the prison to hear what the third wish was to be.

"Now," said he to his prisoner, "tell me what your third demand is, that it may be granted at once, and you may be hung out of hand, for I am tired of your demands."

"Sire," answered his prisoner, "I have but one more favor to request of your majesty, which, when you have granted, I shall die content. It is merely that you will cause the eyes of those who saw my father turn the fish over to be put out."

"Very good," replied the emperor, "your demand is but natural, and springs from a good heart. Let the chamberlain be seized," he continued, turning to his guards.

"I, Sire!" cried the chamberlain; "I did not see any thing—it was the steward."

"Let the steward be seized then," said the king.

But the steward protested with tears in his eyes, that he had not witnessed any thing of what had been reported, and said it was the butler. The butler declared that he had seen nothing of the matter, and that it must have been the valets. But they protested that they were utterly ignorant of what had been charged against the count; in short, it turned out that nobody could be found who had seen the count commit the offense, upon which the prisoner said:

"I appeal to you, my father, as to another Solomon. If nobody saw the offense committed, the count can not be guilty, and my husband is innocent."

The emperor frowned, and forthwith the courtiers began to murmur; then he smiled, and immediately their visages became radiant.

"Let it be so," said his majesty; "let him live, though I have put many a man to death for a lighter offense than his. But if he is not hung, he is married. Justice has been done."

THE PRESIDENT'S INAUGURAL.

THE first inauguration of President LINCOLN was under circumstances of most intense interest. The people were wrought up to a high pitch of expectation. They were eager with apprehension, which was partially relieved by the eagerness of the hope that balanced with their fear. The apprehension related to the revolutionary excitement which was already culminating in the Gulf States—the hope wavered toward some deep resource of statesmanship, as yet unknown, which might master the storm and save the Republic. In the election of Mr. LINCOLN, the people, though they issued no writ of ejectment against slavery in States, yet forbade its extension over the national territory. By his election the Government became national without doing the least violence to the reserved immunities of the States; it became national instead of sectional. But the necessity had already long existed for a sectional government in order to the perpetuation of slavery. A national creed was, therefore, unacceptable to the South. She required that every issue in which all the people were interested should be decided in the interest of a part, and that part a minority. Because in a single instance the people had decided otherwise a revolution of terrible import was growing rapidly toward its crisis. And the watch-word of the revolutionists was this paradox: That the Republic was invading certain States because it would no longer suffer their invasion on its own most sacred immunities.

For two reasons the popular expectation centred upon Mr. LINCOLN. His election was in some sort the pretext of the revolutionists, and his attitude toward the revolution must now represent the decision of the people. Up to the time of his inauguration Mr. LINCOLN was very reticent. But in his inaugural address his voice was clear and decided. The peculiar feature of the address was its nationality. Up to that moment the national consciousness of our people had found little expression of itself. Now we were one people, with a common boundary which we determined should be as invirlable by traitors as by a foreign enemy.

Mr. LINCOLN'S second inaugural address was delivered under far different circumstances from the first. In the one case the address was the principal thing. March 4, 1861, the people waited upon Mr. LINCOLN'S words; March 4, 1865, the solemn ceremonies of inauguration were inseparable from an expression of triumph—it was the occasion itself and the spectacle which impressed the people. The most that was required of the second inaugural address was that it should befit the occasion. It was needless to reiterate statements already given as to the policy to be pursued in the conduct of the war, or as to the conditions necessary to peace. The President's views on these matters are well known to the people, and they are the views of the people. In fact, President LINCOLN, in this second address, simply alludes briefly to the change of situation since his first inauguration, only dwelling for a moment upon the relation of slavery to the war, and then proceeds to take upon himself anew the vow of fidelity to the Constitution of the United States. The ceremony was an impressive one. The most hopeful thought connected with this event is that its next repetition will find us a united and happy people.

LET US MAKE THE BEST OF IT.

LIFE is but a fleeting dream,
Care destroys the rest of it;
Swift it glideth like a stream,
Mind you make the best of it!
Talk not of your weary woes,
Troubles, or the rest of it;
If we have but brief repose,
Let us make the best of it!

If your friend has got a heart,
There is something fine in him;
Can away with darker part,
Cling to what's divine in him.
Friendship is our best relief—
Make no heartless jest of it;
It will brighten every grief,
If we make the best of it.

Happiness despises state;
'Tis no sage experiment,
Simply that the wise and great
May turn by and merriment;
Rank is not its spell refined—
Sorrows or the rest of it—
We shall overcome them all,
If we make the best of it.

AN APPARITION.

"FATE will find us out," says the proverb. One day it certainly found out Sabrina D'Arlincourt.

She would be an old, old woman, were she alive now; for it was more than fifty years ago that she flourished, the belle of belles, among all the beautiful women in the old town of the Provinces, Mer Sable, on the coast in the British army, neither particularly talented nor efficient, had been stationed there during many years previous to the War of 1812, and seemed likely to remain there through the greater part of its continuance. Once he had been a wild youth, living the genuine of gay London lives, till he contracted a slender pecuniary debt, not merely that of the son of a younger son; for the cadets of the D'Arlincourt race were unexpectedly well endowed, in order that the heir might maintain his ancient line in all its pristine magnificence. Thus when nothing remained to him but the income of his sword—an income that he had never regarded as more than loose change—the young gentleman obtained a transfer to another regiment, destined to pick up a rich wife thereby as he patrolled England from end to end; and before he had accomplished his purpose he was surprised to find that he had taken his across seas and stationed him permanently in the province of Nova Scotia. Here, after many a weary year, he one day married a meek little woman, who gave him his daughter Sabrina and died; and here he continued to live, and, as he had no rich wife with a rod of iron, by a natural retributive justice the young lady hence forth ruled him.

Sabrina D'Arlincourt had a good deal of the beauty that had always distinguished her family—not a lively beauty, but a commanding one, that received involuntary homage as if a queen had passed. If she did the most daring and unheard-of things it was with such an astonishing grace that they seemed the only things fit to be done, and the habit of ruling her father passed into a habit of ruling every one else. Her tall and sumptuous figure seemed formed only to be adorned by richest hues and softest textures; her white hand, shapely as sculpture, carried itself like a part of itself; her dark hair, with its large loose wave, bore in its shadows just enough of that tinge of red to make it seem as if golden dust had been powdered and sprinkled through it; while her rich color, her thick and brilliant eyes, and her splendid bearing, her erect and haughty features, all gave her the right as well as the power not only to reign but to take captive.

Old Major D'Arlincourt, it is true, loved his daughter, and after her fashion Sabrina was very fond of him. In return for his adoration he wished also a little worship. The only way in which it seemed practicable to him to obtain it was by diluting upon certain remembrances of his childhood—the past glories of his uncle and the present woes of his cousin, Sir D'Arlincourt D'Arlincourt of D'Arlincourt Castle. It was not singular that, upon such recitals, Sabrina should have fancied herself entitled to perfect fealty, and although she belonged to the provincial branch in England, should have pleased herself upon the fact that in Nova Scotia there were no other D'Arlincourts than themselves. It was also not singular that, since there was no other way to meet them upon their own ground, she should aspire to some alliance that, when they went home to England, would place them on a level with the eminence of their cousins the D'Arlincourts. It was then, these altitudes considered, extremely singular that, one day, Sabrina D'Arlincourt found herself the promised wife of a poor and obscure young subaltern, who earned a scanty livelihood by his portraits. It only proved that this superb creature, with her outer crust of pride and power, had an undercurrent of fire like the molten stream that courses artrially under the hardened surface of the lava torrent.

It had been a gala-day in the place; troops had been under review, and ships-of-war had come boating up the harbor, with all their white sails set, like a fleet of swans. Sabrina, with a company of her friends and subjects—she had no enemies—was on horseback, making herself, as was unavoidable, a part of the pageant, in her purple habit, while feather, and frowned veil, riding an Arab that listened to no voice and obeyed no hand but hers—a horse that had been sent out to her by her lofty cousin on some report of the beauty that did honor to his name. Suddenly, one moment, not at the noisy blare of the trumpets nor the salute of the artillery, but at the flirt of a white handkerchief, the little Arab sulked, reared, and shot forward, went flying through the city with Sabrina in the saddle, as he leaped some obstacle, and taking the bit between his teeth, threw out his haunch, and left the rest behind him at a pace that the wind itself could hardly follow. A dozen gallants started in pursuit, which only made matters worse with this fiery spirit of the desert. Sabrina, however, was a born-woman to dream of disaster, would have reckoned enjoyed the race had not a fearful doubt, grown every moment into a certainty, that at the end of this road yawned a dry gully, too wide for any leaping, and floored with rocks and thorn-bushes some thirty feet below, and that there the terrible death that gully offered she and the Arab were plunging on together. While then, for the first time, this unbowed lineage was brought face to face with unspeakable fear, her eye, seeking vainly for help, caught sight of a form dashing down a hill-side some way beyond her on the right, standing in the middle of the road, waving a hat and cheering, the owner of which, who was a young officer, with a daring sprang caught at the bridle and dragged the lady from the saddle, and the animal turned about, raced back to its own, accustomed stable, and left the rest of the pursuers, with his empty saddle, till they turned the angle of the road, and caught sight of the rescued in the arms of the man who had saved her.

The first thing that Sabrina D'Arlincourt saw, as she woke from the swoon and from the nightmare of death that had never really overtaken her, in the fascination in connection with herself, was this face bending over her own. No wonder that it seemed to her as beautiful as it was; and, in fact, was a more truly beautiful countenance than Gabriel Andre's never existed of a picture; and if it was not perfect—if it that night, it was the first time that any identity had ever haunted her dreams with the least special significance. It was not the man, indeed, before whom D'Arlincourt had previously desired to send home a likeness of his daughter—that this daughter might command a higher price in the rich market, a pier that he might transfer her bloom to his canvas, so far as it was possible for any pencil to do it. The young painter was unknown to fame. Consequently were that Sir D'Arlincourt's rapture found expression in fit and magnificent presents; Miss Sabrina would have been the first to laugh at them. Sir D'Arlincourt insisted that her young cousin-in-law's measure should be sent home to her own dressmaker in London, and that she should be fitted by a artired in the supplest Parisian fashioning. Not to accept every thing offered by the hand of the lover is to reflect upon him; to refuse nothing now and then between the coquettish lashes to make certain that he was still there, dreamed for a moment of a perfect union of happiness and peace. Nothing could have exceeded the pleasure of Mrs. Howard, Sabrina's governess, at the announcement—which the uninterrupted attitude of the two gave her as she entered the room—she was one of that numerous drive-nothings who received the D'Arlincourt orders. It was to be of Spanish brocade, each fold to fall in lustre and amplitude above white and pink of such as some were but, and the garnishing of the whole to be in Irish lace, sown with seed-pearl.

"Ah! I am not the first to bring you this," said Gabriel, sliding down a moonbeam; but whereabouts in our little house that is to be can such splendor hide itself as a sun like you?"

And at that Sabrina began to build fine schemes of all that her cousin, D'Arlincourt, decided to be large gold and silver, and the young artist white and both sought English shores, as had been planned. It would not be in any little house that her future should be spent for her father Joshua and every other had found knighthood, why might the day not come when Lady Gabriel Angier should take her place beside Lady Lady of D'Arlincourt Court; and for this consummation her hopes rested far more on her cousin's influence than on Gabriel's talent. Not that she thought him less as well pleased as any maiden at thought of the dazzle of her wedding-gown.

Meanwhile Gabriel, having become a lover and ceased to be a monitor, was a lover in earnest, growing nearly as much absorbed as Sabrina was in that of herself. It made no moment to her that her companions wondered or satirized. She herself was the only one that she allowed, and, all unregarded, the marriage was only delayed for the arrival of the Foundell with the wedding paraphernalia on board of Sabrina's and in Mrs. Howard's and eyes nothing constituted the freight of the Foundell but that one box of bridal finery. And when one remembered all the blithe scene on the morning that order was written out, all the blushing, the whispering, the laughing, the planning, how gay Gabriel was; how oblivious the duenna; how sweet and sunshiny Sabrina herself, it would have been not unnatural with a host of recollections were sufficient in themselves to freight any vessel.

When Gabriel put off the austerity that perhaps he had felt it necessary to wear as a guard against the bewitchment and beauty of this girl, in station so far beyond his reach, as it then appeared, nothing surpassed his winning power. Sabrina felt it so much that, as if warned by an innermost instinct, half the time when he came she refused to see him, with a wayward impulse not to subject herself wholly to this influence until irretrievably its boundless empire. She was the charm of his waking moments crossed by an angry hovering jealousy, when others found favor with her, that in a white face made his eyes dark, glittering, and restless, above compressed lips; and then, as the glance of them met hers, Sabrina would be only the more mischievously wild and gay, till he would quietly hid her alien and go out to walk off his mood as he might in the dark and lonely streets; and then through all his severe manner meant for others, that look meant for her only would haunt and hurt her half the night.
